My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley) averted to the fact that today has seen the maiden speech in another place of my noble Friend the Earl of Stockton. I should like to conclude by reminding the House of a speech about unemployment that he made in the 1930s. He referred to Disraeli who said in a famous phrase that the keys of India lay not in Kandahar or Herat, but in London. So it is with unemployment. The keys of unemployment lie not in Durham or south Wales but in Downing street and Threadneedle street.

8.7 pm

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I am glad to have the opportunity of following the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell) because among other reasons, he has the curious distinction — if that is the correct way to put it—of being a former pupil of mine. At least in his thoughtful speech, with which I substantially agreed, he spared us what we have become far too accustomed to in recent years, and that is the experience of hearing Ministers at the Dispatch Box trying to justify and explain what has happened and what has gone wrong by the selective use of statistics.

In view of the complexity of our economy and the great panoply of statistics, it is by no means impossible for the diligent researcher, winnowing through all the available material, to come up from time to time with statistics that support almost any view. By the careful selection of base dates and the use of percentages rather than absolutes, comparing like with unlike and so on, Ministers no doubt feel that for the purposes of any debate they can produce figures and arguments which satisfy the needs of the moment. I doubt whether anyone in the House of Commons is convinced by that type of argument. We heard an excellent example of it this afternoon from the Chancellor.

First, it is easy enough to set aside those little sweepings of statistics on the margins, and to invite Ministers to confront the central importance of the maze of statistics — those about our output, trade and investment, and most of all those about unemployment. That has been done so often that even Ministers must know the truth and importance of those terrible figures.

Another way of rebutting that statistical sleight of hand is open to any member of our society who looks around him in Britain today, particularly if he is able, by virtue of foreign travel, to compare the way in which other societies are confronting similar problems. Inevitably he will conclude that Britain is poorer, scruffier and shabbier. It has failed to arrest its economic decline and has started to run out of faith, hope and confidence in itself. It has a society that is turning in on itself, demanding sacrifices from those least able to make them. It has a lower level of public services and it does things worse than other countries. After looking around the world, I find that it is a society that is almost a byword for failure.

That is the reality that lies behind the Government's false claims, the Prime Minister's vainglorious posturings and the Chancellor's complacency. It is a reality that Conservative Members know as well as Labour Members. That is why we are increasingly hearing a chorus of demands from Conservatives for a change in policy.

The "ship of state" is a familiar metaphor, but our ship of state, under its present command, is like an aging passenger liner whose paint is peeling and whose engines are belching smoke and on which we are heading for the rocks. On the bridge is the Prime Minister, the captain. She appears to be unaware of us. She is enjoying wearing the uniform. She is told by her mate, the Chancellor, not to worry about the impending disaster—the fact that we are heading inland instead of out to the open sea. He says, "Don't take any notice of the course that has been plotted or of the facts and figures that show that our speed and direction are leading to us running aground. We are, believe it or not, heading for the open sea, and the last thing we must do is change course, repair the engine or provide some more fuel."

The Chancellor says, "If we happen to run aground, there is an easy remedy. We have been using that remedy for five years now, and no one so far has been worried too much, at least on our side. The remedy is that, as we get into shallow waters and the disaster is impending, we merely jettison a few skilled crew and a few essential bits of equipment. We shall float off the sandbank—don't worry too much about it. The last thing you must do is listen to the creaks and groans from the shuddering ship, the cries of pain and the sounds of conflict from those on board." That is the reality of the Government's economic policy.

There is a growing realisation not just among Conservative Members but throughout the country—not least in industry—that the Chancellor is finally running out of options and excuses. I believe that the Chancellor senses that also, and that is why he is scraping the bottom of the barrel. He knows that his somewhat quixotic interpretation of success stories around the world, not just in America but in many diverse countries such as Australia, Sweden, Japan and Austria, will not convince many people. The Chancellor, however, persists in the unlikely argument that their success is due to real wages. He seems unaware of the fact that if he succeeded in convincing people that that is the course that we should follow, he would announce the final denial of hope and confession of failure.

The Chancellor's problem is that he continually says that any attempt to grapple with unemployment will be self-defeating. In his own terms, that is true, because he postulates a completely unchanged monetary polciy. As long as the Chancellor's monetary targets remain sacrosanct, there is no escape from increasing unemployment. What is true of the remedies that the Opposition would pursue is true also of the remedy to which the Chancellor points. No solution will be found by cutting real wages if the Chancellor does not insist on adhering to the other aspects of his policy.

Let us assume that the Chancellor could persuade people that cuts in real wages were necessary. I concede immediately that the right hon. Gentleman is right to say that we must improve our international cost competitiveness, which has declined substantially under this Government, despite ministerial rhetoric about the constant need to improve. Incidentally, it always strikes me as odd that Ministers continually disclaim responsibility for the shocking decline in our manufacturing trade performance, because they say that it is the inevitable consequence of North sea oil; yet, at the same time, they argue that we must improve productivity and competitiveness, force down wage costs and so on. What would be the point of achieving those difficult changes if no improvement in our trade performance were possible?

Such failures and lapses of reason underlie much of the Chancellor's current policy. If the Chancellor were to try to resolve his difficulties by forcing down real wages, almost certainly he would not succeed. If 3 million-plus unemployed are not sufficient to force down wages, one shudders to think how many more jobless we need and how much more social bitterness we have to endure before wage rates fall. Even if the Chancellor could, by some miracle, force down wage rates, how many people would believe that he could do it sufficiently quickly and effectively to close the gap on our competitors, whose unit wage costs are falling because of expansion, not contraction? The Chancellor concedes that their wage unit costs are falling. It defies all credibility to believe that we could force down our wage costs by contraction and compulsion to a degree sufficient to match the effort made by our competitors and catch the train that is leaving the station.

Let us go further and assume that, despite all those difficulties, the Chancellor is able to cut real wages. The Chancellor says that, if only real wages had been 1 per cent. or 2 per cent. lower, many hundreds of thousands of jobs would have been created. From where would those jobs have come? There would have been no increase in effective domestic demand, no stimulus to output or additional resources to finance more jobs. Nothing would have happened in the domestic economy that would conceivably have provided the resources to provide a single extra job, simply on account of cuts in real wages.

The Chancellor might argue that the improvement in our cost competitiveness would create new export markets and that that is where the increase in output would come. The Chancellor must know that, with an unchanged monetary policy, any improvement in competitiveness to improve our balance of payments would be immediately counteracted by a rise in the exchange rate and negated by an appreciating rate for the pound. Any temporary benefit to investment, output and employment would be quickly stifled. That would be entirely in accordance with the Chancellor's stated policies. There would be no solution to the problem. Not a single extra job would be provided from domestic demand. There would be no solution from increased demand from abroad for our goods.

Where will the Chancellor find the increased resources to create the additional jobs? He certainly cannot look to a further fall in the savings ratio, because that is already at its lowest point since 1971. Even if the savings ratio fell further, the Chancellor would find that, by his policies, he had achieved no solution. He would still have had to fund the PSBR and pull in funds from abroad by raising interest rates, and that would mean dearer money and a higher exchange rate. So again the Chancellor would square the circle and box himself into a contractionary policy.

The Chancellor's predicament is increasingly recognised. That means that the days of the Chancellor and his policies could be numbered. It is significant that he lost his battle in the Cabinet a week ago and that he was able to sustain his position only by virtue of what all the commentators called creative accounting and relying on windfalls. It is significant that he did not, so one is led to believe, enjoy the full support of his own Prime Minister. The example of the American economy is simply too overwhelming to be ignored, not just in economic but in political terms. Within a year, when we shall be halfway through this Parliament, literally dozens and scores, if not hundreds, of Conservative Members will start to say to themselves, "Can we win the next election? Can we hold our seats without a change in policy?", particularly when they have the glowing example of a Right-wing American President sweeping to a virtually unprecedented victory on the strength of policies which, so far, have been anathema to the Conservative Government.

The one glimmer of hope on the horizon that I see is that those pressures could induce the Prime Minister to consider a change in policy. For her, the fact that the Chancellor is so closely associated with the present policy could be a bonus because she could announce the change by replacing the Chancellor with someone more amenable and less committed to the existing disaster.

The tragedy for the Chancellor—perhaps I should not express any sympathy for him personally—is that we are constantly told that he is an intelligent man. If he is as intelligent as his admirers lead us to believe, he must know that his options have been closed and that he has nothing further to offer. He also has the experience of having engineered successfully a recovery on a previous occasion. He did it in 1982-83 as a pre-election manoeuvre. He did so in very clever ways — by overfunding so that the money supply looked to be unchanged and then funnelling back to the private sector through the sale of commercial bills the money that he had apparently taken out of the money supply. Therefore, he knows how to engineer a recovery. He knows that his present policies cannot work. I believe that that is why his recent performance has been so bad. If he really is as intelligent as we are told and knows that his policies have failed, that would explain why he has so little to offer. That is why he can only continue to mouth the same old unconvincing platitudes.

If the consequences of the long, sad and disastrous experiment in monetarist policies is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to be sacrificed, I shall feel sorry for him, but it would be a tiny price to pay for restoring hope to the vast majority of the British people.

8.23 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), who made an eloquent contribution to the debate. However, like so many contributions from the Opposition Benches, it was long on criticism and short on solutions. Without wishing to follow the hon. Gentleman too far down the route of seafaring metaphors, I should like to say that it was not clear from what he said whether he would rather the Government succumbed to the temptations of the Scylla of everlastingly higher public spending than to the Charybdis of giving in to the trade unions on every issue.

Not for the first time since I have been in the House, some of the most constructive contributions to the debate on the economy have come from Government Back Benchers. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley), who made a stylish contribution, I agree that the most urgent economic issue of the day is unemployment. I am sure that that view is shared on both sides of the House. Many hon. Members have stressed their personal experience in coming to that conclusion. I also believe that if we fail to solve that economic problem quickly, unemployment will become the most urgent social problem of the day.

I should like to refer to the speech by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer). I am sorry that he is not present, but I shall say what I tried to intervene to say while he was making his speech, but he did not give way. I admit that I cannot even match the military distinction of my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot, who is a former lance-corporal. My only connection with the services is that I was a humble cadet pilot in my university air squadron. In a way I am relieved that the hon. Member for Walton is not present, because I would have to tell him that it was the Cambridge university air squadron.

The hon. Gentleman attacked the Government for confronting the workers. I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman who is confronting members of the NUM who wish to go to work. Are they not being confronted by their leader, Arthur Scargill? I do not want to be too unkind to the hon. Gentleman, as we in the Conservative party have much to thank him for, because he contributed more than anyone else to the growth in the Government's popularity by his chairmanship of the Labour party conference.

Contrary to what the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said, I understand clearly the aims of the Government's medium term financial strategy. It is part of an overall policy designed to achieve a low and stable rate of inflation. That is an essential precondition for the creation of new jobs. Yesterday I rebutted the outrageous slur that the Government do not care about unemployment. They are certainly not using high unemployment as an instrument of policy, still less as an objective of their economic policy.

However, apart from inflation, there are two other essential preconditions for new jobs. The first is the proper control of public expenditure and the public sector borrowing requirement; the second is the achievement of a steady rate of economic expansion. The figure of 3·5 per cent. next year is modest, not excessive. I suppose that we can regard it as satisfactory, but only just. This year, we must not overlook the contribution of the miners' strike in cutting the rate of growth in 1984. That reduction in the growth rate has been a means of destroying other workers' jobs. I hope that the leader of the NUM is aware of the damage that he is causing to fellow workers.

I approach the subject of unemployment as an optimist. Like some hon. Members, I do not accept that technology means no return to full employment. Some 150 years ago, two thirds of the British work force worked on the land. Today less than 5 per cent. is on the land. If the pundits in the 1830s had foreseen that decimation of jobs in agriculture, undoubtedly they would have predicted vast unemployment. Yet during that space of 150 years, when there have been huge advances in technology, the work force and employment have increased manyfold. Therefore, as my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell) said, technology can be the creator, not the destroyer, of jobs.

For that reason, and also because of the forthcoming demographic changes that mean that after the next 30 years the number of people of working age relative to the number of people of retirement age will go down sharply, I do not support fashionable schemes for encouraging early retirement and lowering the retirement age. In the first place, such schemes are not terribly effective because their proponents acknowledge that for every two people who are forced to take early retirement, the best that one can hope for is one new job for someone coming off the unemployment register. Secondly, such schemes are expensive in terms of extra pension costs, and the resources needed for them would be better used elsewhere.

It is generally agreed that there are three causes of unemployment. The extent to which one believes that any one of them is dominant depends on one's political viewpoint. The first is the cost of labour; the second is macro-economic policy, particularly the level of public expenditure as it relates to the amount of demand in the economy; and the third comprises the non-financial obstacles to employment, some of which were referred to yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. I wish to concentrate on the first two causes, because the Government can act on both those fronts without abandoning their responsible fiscal and monetary policy.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has often stressed the cost of labour as a principal cause of unemployment. In our debate on unemployment two weeks ago, he said that a 3 per cent. real increase in wages could have cost 500,000 jobs, and his analysis is supported by academic research at the London School of Economics into the inelasticity of employment relative to real wages.

The Government could reduce the cost of labour by cutting employers' national insurance contributions. It is becoming fashionable to advocate tinkering with the contributions, but I believe that it should be a priority for the available cash — we were told yesterday that it would be £1·5 billion, but let us hope that by the time of next year's Budget it proves to be more than that—to be used to cut employers' national insurance contributions. That is far more urgent than tax cuts, which are not in great demand now that we have got rid of the confiscatory rates that we inherited from the Labour Government. Tax cuts for individuals are not such a high priority, because they do not directly affect job creation.

Employers' national insurance contributions are 10·45 per cent. of wages up to £13,000 a year, and the contributions total £11·68 billion per annum. A 3 per cent. cut would cost about £3·3 billion, of which £1·2 billion is already borne by the public sector. The net impact on the public sector borrowing requirement would be only just over £2 billion — not much more than what the Chancellor hopes to have available next year.

If we assume no increase in public sector employment, the consequence of such a cut in the employers' national insurance contributions could be the creation of 300,000 private sector jobs. The cost of unemployment, in terms of benefits and lost revenue, is more than £5,000 a year for each unemployed person. Therefore, the creation of 300,000 more jobs could produce an eventual saving of £1·6 billion. Therefore, the net final cost to the PSBR would be little more than £500 million.

Of course, there would be a time lag of perhaps two or three years before the full effects were felt, but some impact should emerge in the first 12 months and, if the policy proved acceptable, the trick could be repeated in 1986 and 1987 and, with one final heave, the whole of the employers' national insurance contribution could be phased out before the end of this Parliament.

Mr. Gould: Why is the hon. Gentleman prepared to concentrate help on the employers' national insurance contribution? Why should it not be concentrated on the employees' contribution? That would have the great advantage of producing a substantial increase in take-home pay at no inflationary cost, which is one of the major factors in the American recovery.

Mr. Yeo: I accept the hon. Gentleman's analysis of what would happen if cuts were concentrated on employees' contributions. Our priorities reflect our differing views of the most effective agent of job creation. I believe that reducing the costs of employers will create jobs more quickly. The hon. Gentleman presumably believes that putting more money into the hands of the workers will produce the same result by increasing demand. There is room to split the cuts according to our individual viewpoints.

The abolition of employers' national insurance contributions would have the incidental advantage of allowing us to do away with the national insurance system —the contributory principle was abandoned many years ago — and employees' contributions could be merged into income tax without any change in take-home pay. Getting rid of the national insurance system would produce an administrative saving of £100 million a year.

As regards the second cause of unemployment, I do not advocate huge increases in public expenditure, but there will be continuing dismay at the restraints on expenditure on house building and home improvements. Those are particularly labour-intensive activities which have low import penetration and a far greater job-creating potential than many other public sector capital projects.

The Department of the Environment's spending on housing has been trimmed in the autumn statement to £2·3 billion, which, even after making the necessary adjustments for capital receipts from the sale of council houses, is quite a lot lower in real terms than the 1979 figure. I hope that the Government will soon reverse that decline. If resources are needed from elsewhere to finance a return to higher spending on housing, we need look no further than the suggestions made in yesterday's excellent speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Hordern), who referred to the regional grants of £600 million, spending on agriculture, and so on. I cite those examples for illustrative purposes.

I support the Chancellor of the Exchequer's efforts to switch from taxes on income to taxes on spending. That is the right way to go, but I must point out that charities are the one category that is exempt from income tax but not from spending taxes. It is odd that a Government who are so committed to a partnership with the voluntary sector should continue to penalise charities by switching taxes without giving those charities any concession.

However, that switch is only one aspect of tax reform. Another equally urgent aspect is the need to integrate income tax and the social security system. Tinkering with either component in isolation will merely produce more anomalies and complications. I hope to see a commitment to that vital reform in next year's Queen's Speech, by which time the results of the social security reviews put in hand this year will be known.

I make a plea for one other small tax concession that would be completely self-financing. I suggest that individuals who wish to employ people in a personal capacity and take someone from the unemployment register should be allowed to set the employment costs against their income tax. By definition, that would be a self-financing concession, and I believe that it would be a small but helpful move towards new job creation.

The Queen's Speech makes no mention of an important contribution to tackling unemployment that would carry no public sector cost. It involves the mobility of labour, which has been an important but often overlooked factor in the American success in job creation.

The new jobs in America are being created not in the old industrial heartlands; they are down in the sun belt. There has been a huge movement of the working population and that process has been facilitated by the availability of accommodation. We have been hampered for decades by the immobility of our labour force, which has been an obstacle to job creation. I believe that that immobility will continue.

Mr. Michael McGuire (Makerfield): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the move from the industrial areas in the United States came about as a result of anti-trade union laws? The jobs have been created in what are known as the right-to-work states. The laws were a way of getting at the unions and making them weaker. Perhaps that is why that example appeals to the Tories.

Mr. Yeo: If it is true, which I doubt, that anti-trade union laws have created millions of new jobs in America —and Opposition Members have frequently cited the American experience as a good example for the Government — perhaps our Government have been derelict in their duty by not bringing in tougher anti-union laws.

We lack suitable accommodation for employees who seek jobs in different parts of the country. The council house system——

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): There is a vast difference between the economic and geographical situation in the United States and that in Britain. In America one can travel thousands of miles in order to obtain employment, but in our tight little island people who have been advised to move away to other regions often find the same situation prevailing there as at home. The hon. Gentleman's parallel between the United States and Britain is erroneous with regard to the movement of labour.

Mr. Yeo: The parallel has been cited more frequently by the Opposition than by the Government. It is the Opposition who hold out the American example as a useful one. I think that the parallel about the movement of labour is fair. Indeed, with a smaller country, it should be easier to move from one region to another.

If there were a proper private rented accommodation sector, there would be places for people to move to in their search for jobs. It is not true, as the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) suggests, that conditions are the same wherever one goes. I am surprised to hear an Opposition Member make that suggestion. One of the Opposition's criticisms—and it has some validity—is that conditions in the north are very different from those in my constituency and in many parts of the south-east, where jobs are available but there is no accommodation. The Government could repeal the Rent Acts at no cost to the private purse, and we could then start to recreate the supply of accommodation. Many property owners, who at present are afraid to offer accommodation for rent, would be willing to let parts of their houses or flats. We would release to the economy a quantity of new resources not at present usefully employed. Greater mobility between regions is an essential precondition to reducing unemployment. I ask my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Employment to urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to introduce the necessary legislation in the coming Session.

I have summarised the measures that I believe would reduce the level of unemployment. I commend them to the House and, in particular, to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, especially as they would in total leave next year's public expenditure at £132 billion.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): Neither the Queen's Speech nor the Chancellor's autumn statement holds out anything for my constituency, which at present is suffering an overall unemployment level of over 25 per cent. and where in large areas it exceeds 50 per cent.

It is evident from the speech of the hon. Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) that he has no comprehension of the problems and the hardship faced in the northern inner cities. The solutions which he has just pronounced show that he has little or no understanding of the problems. In the Sheffield, Central constituency about 10,300 people are unemployed, and the deprivation has to be seen to be believed. The only actions that the Government are taking are compounding the problem. The unemployment figures that I have given are the official figures. They do not include all the unemployed. Many people, especially married women, are now being denied the opportunity to take part in community programmes, and old people are being deprived of an extra pound in connection with the heating allowance. The Government are continuing to attack people in the most deprived regions.

Hon. Members may remember that Sheffield was once famous for its steel industry. Two years ago, the Government decided to embark upon the denationalisation of that industry by means of the development of the Phoenix schemes — part private and part public. We were told that that was the way forward, the new formula for privatisation and the panacea for the ills of the industry. The Government brought in Mr. MacGregor—the man who has committed 100,000 steel workers to the dole queue in the past five years.

I draw attention to the role of Mr. MacGregor in the Phoenix schemes, and particularly Phoenix III. On Saturday, an exclusive report in the Morning Telegraph said that Sheffield Forgemasters—which is Phoenix III —was on the brink of disaster. According to the report, Mr. Scholey, the chief executive of the British Steel Corporation, had made an announcement to the Steel Industry Management Association. He had not told the workers at the factories concerned or indeed the management there. He announced to the association that the BSC would have to pick up the tab for paying the wages. That article exposed the situation, and on Saturday an article in the Financial Times entitled stated:

"Forgemasters set to receive a major cash injection"

"A major cash injection at Sheffield Forgemasters, the engineering and special steels company formed jointly by the British Steel Corporation and Johnson & Firth Brown almost two years ago, is expected to be announced within two weeks."

[Mr. Richard Caborn]

That is the success story. Two years ago the employers — not the trade union side but the employers — were pleading not to be forced into a shotgun marriage between the private and the public sector. They believed that that was the wrong way to approach a major sector of the industry. Nevertheless, Big Mac came in. The industrialists — not the trade unions, though they had their point of view—said that the way in which he was insisting on the merger and on developing that part of the steel industry was doomed to failure. Mr. MacGregor persisted. Two years later, when he has gone on to be the butcher of our mining industry, 100,000 jobs have been lost in the steel industry. That situation should be compared with that of the steel-producing countries of the EEC. Mr. MacGregor forced a privatisation against all the advice. Two years later the banks have to go in with a rescue operation and the BSC announces that it will have to pick up the tab.

This sector of the British steel industry supplies the nuclear industry and aerospace, and provides the open die forgings which are an extremely important part of our industrial base. If we are to develop the high-technology industries and if we are to move into new markets in aerospace, this is the type and quality of steel that will be needed. The destruction wrought on the industry by Mr. MacGregor could set it back by two to three years.

The Morning Telegraph is not famous for supporting the trade union movement but it states:

> "Hindsight is often patronising and arrogant, but there are many who often feared that Sheffield Forgemasters had been formed and was being operated on too tight a shoestring, given the huge problems of rationalisation and recession that it has faced from day one."

That has always been a problem of the steel industry, especially the private sector. The steel industry has also had to bear some of the highest energy costs in the EEC because of Government policy. It has also had to make substantial interest payments. In 1980, Aurora paid £6·7 million in interest, Hadfields paid £3·3 million and Johnson Firth Brown paid £9·7 million. That money could have produced a hell of a lot of jobs. If the money had been invested, especially in research and development, we should still have a fairly competitive edge.

I should now like to discuss Phoenix II. About two years ago Hadfields was the centre of attention. The Tories were crying out against pickets outside the gates saying, "Carry on working, lads: we will be right behind you." Hadfields is not only shut—there is hardly a brick of it left. That is the result of the help of the Tory Government who condemned people who were fighting for their jobs in the steel industry. The Government dare not announce the carve-up of Phoenix II because of the problems with Phoenix III and financial difficulties which arise not out of market share, management or the labour force but out of the financial structure that the Government forced through. Although the Government dare not announce Phoenix II, they have sold Hadfields down. Working miners should compare the promises that the Prime Minister gave at the Tory party conference and again last night with the promises that she gave to workers who crossed picket lines at Hadfields when they were asked to stand and defend their jobs. The Government's record on defending those who scab against their fellow workers in defence of their industry is appalling.

In the past four years Sheffield has lost about 25,000 jobs in the steel industry. The local authority's employment department has attempted, through innovation and consultation, to develop the local economy. It has developed about 20 co-operatives and created 1,000 new jobs. But what have we got from the Government who are crying crocodile tears about unemployment? They have condemned such initiatives that are now to be suppressed by rate-capping. The metropolitan counties, which have also tried to develop such schemes, are to be abolished. Successive hon. Members have talked about putting money into the economy — it is difficult to establish whether the Government are acting in concert with their Back Benchers. We have tried and trusted mechanisms which understand local needs, but when they try to generate local economies the Government, through legislation, by destroying the metropolitan counties and by rate-capping, destroy their initiatives.

It is time that the Government took basic manufacturing industries on board. Nobody denies that new technology must be accepted by trade unions and others, but industries such as the steel industry and basic manufacturing should not be written off as the Government are trying to write off many. Their performance in regard to the steel industry under the leadership of Mr. MacGregor has been appalling.

8.53 pm

Mr. Alistair Burt (Bury, North): Although I lack the advantage of being a member of the General Synod of the Church of England or a spiritual Member of another place, I should like to say something about the north-south debate in relation to the current state of the economy and its development as envisaged by the Queen's Speech.

Conventional wisdom is directed to increasing the divide between north and south. There is more than a grain of truth behind some recent expressions of concern. I was unable to hear the speech of the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland), but the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) made some telling points. I should like to remind him and others, however, that there is another side to the coin. It is not correct to allow people to believe that sitting at the northern tip of a prosperous south is an economic desert. I do not wish to deny that there are problems in the north of England, but it is after investment like everyone else and if we continue to beat our chests and to tell people all over the world how dreadful it is, who on earth will want to invest capital there and provide jobs for us? It is important to give the other side of the story.

The north-west has seen some of its traditional manufacturing industry decline, but it has done its best not to stand still. Any new industrial survey of the area would show our successful aerospace industry, new technology industries, important work being done in regard to the offshore oil and gas industries and heavy investment in the nuclear power industry. We have the new freeport at Liverpool docks and the finest airport outside London—Manchester international airport, which should also be a freeport. They are success stories for the north-west and they join the best of our older industries which continue to change with the times and are working hard and successfully.

The hon. Member for Stretford referred to a recent economic survey produced by the Manchester chamber of commerce and industry. In that connection I am reminded of the old joke in which the optimist looks at a bottle and says, "It is half full," and the pessimist says, "It is half empty." There are two sides to the survey. Welcome improvements in deliveries and orders are shown in the report, as are booming home and export markets. There are better figures for manufacturing production. Some 56 per cent. of firms now work at or above 90 per cent. capacity compared with only 43 per cent. in June. General business confidence in the region has also shown a change for the better.

For the first time, the survey recorded a significant difficulty in recruiting skilled workers. The shortage of skills is noticeable throughout the country. It is surely at that that the Government are directing some of their youth and adult training measures. I refer right hon. and hon. Members who are worried about the expansion of public sector borrowing to the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) who said where public expenditure could be used to good purpose. It is not enough for Conservative Members to say that all public expenditure is bad and for Opposition Members to say that all public expenditure is good. We should be able to distinguish between good and bad investment. Investment by the Government in the training of young people to meet skill shortages is good and we should not be afraid to say so.

I recently toured the youth training service in my constituency. I can only praise the work of the local authority and the sponsors who have produced more than a 60 per cent. success rate from the first 12 months' work. It is wrong to characterise the north of England as entirely derelict. If people there are doing their best to survive in difficult times, how much better they could do if they received a little more help from their friends in government. Although I appreciate the success of the north-west, it is impossible to disguise the appallingly low base from which that success is springing. Inevitable industrial changes in trade and technology have affected the traditional industries of the north-west, and given a boost to higher unemployment.

There is a perceived trend in the Government's economic policy, which is deeply worrying to people in the north. They wonder whether, while they fulfil their side of the bargain, the Government are fulfilling theirs. I refer to the continuing change between the manufacturing and service industries. The shift from manufacturing to service industries has not been kind to the north-west. Those setting up in the new service industries are not settling in as quickly as we would wish. It is proper that the economy changes with time and that market forces direct the Government to support what is best for the country as a whole, but it is not proper for Governments to consider that manufacturing industry has reached its timely end and must wither and die with their blessing. Although the manufacturing sector provides only 30 per cent. of jobs, it contributes nearly 70 per cent. of foreign currency earnings.

Some sectors of manufacturing industry can outstrip anything offered in terms of world competition, but they cannot defeat manufacturing industry subsidised by foreign Governments. The Government must make it clear to those in manufacturing industry that strong support is there not merely in word but in deed. I see nothing in the Queen's Speech to reassure me of that.

Britain cannot afford an economy entirely of services or entirely of manufacturing industries. There must, of necessity, be a balance between the two. The Government should be capable of discernment and of supporting the best of manufacturing industry without committing themselves necessarily to an industry which could never be competitive in any environment. The Government can do two things in particular.

First, in a review of areas of high unemployment and difficulty, the Government should examine industries in decline and those which are doing well. They should then consider what assistance they can give to allow those industries to do even better, because that is where jobs will be created. Perhaps the Government could think about collective reductions in national insurance in regional areas of high unemployment.

Secondly, the Government could take a wider view of their supportive role in industry. For example, for many years our heavy manufacturing industry has been at a disadvantage regarding energy costs. We know that the French have done well because of the nuclear element in their fuel supply. Surely we can produce a better deal for our intensive energy users. In France, energy policy is directed to producing the cheapest energy for the benefit of French industry. Our energy prices should not be directed towards providing the Treasury with a back door way to cover up its inadequacies.

The Government are right to look at some of their successes, notably the real reduction in inflation, as a stepping stone to future recovery, but they must beware of the language in which they couch the description of the recovery. To be told that we are in the fourth year of recovery with unemployment at 3·5 million, is a definition of an economic boom unknown to me. It is all very well to talk about it, but, as unemployment climbs in a constituency such as mine, optimism must be tempered with realism if the Government are to retain credibility.

Unemployment in the Bury-Bolton travel-to-work area is touching 17 per cent., which is the seventh worst in the north-west of England. To my sorrow and concern, I see my home town of Bury comparing itself with industrial wastelands with which it never before had anything in common. That is the basis of the anger in the debate between north and south and of the obvious anxiety expressed by the hon. Members for Stretford and for Manchester, Central. Unemployment is abysmal, and it is time the Government recognised the pain that hon. Members must endure in their constituencies when they deal with the problem. Whether the Government deny it or not, it is time they realised that many people are saying that some of the unemployment problem is their fault.

My constituents understand the kernel of good sense at the heart of the Government's message and know, because they are sensible, that a number of factors contributing to unemployment cannot be laid at the Government's door. However, they will look hard at those who continue to propound the wearing of the hair shirt of unemployment because somehow it is good for them. The Government must explain how wage cuts can be the next answer, when those industries in which there is competition for jobs are the unskilled low-wage industries. In industries where labour is not plentiful, the inevitable market forces work in the opposite direction. My constituents will be anxious to see what lessons the Government learn from the United States' experience. They will be anxious that the right lessons, not the wrong ones, are learnt.

My constituents will continue to try to understand the benefits of industrial policies based on sound money, but in their heart of hearts they will want to see the Government wide open to every option available to reduce unemployment. Many of them were rehearsed in a thoughtful debate recently, and a number were spelt out in more detail in a recent book, "Jobs Ahead", written by my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Sir P. Goodhart), which is based on the work of the One Nation group.

My constituents will not demand to see the Chancellor perform miracles in the desert, but they expect him to be out there with his stick tapping at the rocks with a shrewd idea where the water might spring from. Above all, they echo the sentiment expressed so well yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for Devizes (Mr. Morrison)—they share the desire for taxation to be reduced as a result of efficiency but they are not at all sure that cuts in direct personal taxation should be a priority to the exclusion of all else. The clamour for reductions in taxation is declining as the number of unemployed rises and those fortunate enough to be paying tax look over their shoulders, fearing the day when for them, too, taxes will no longer be a problem. If the Chancellor can find £1·5 billion to be sensibly used before the next Budget, he would do well to consider all the options open to him to direct that money to the nation's most pressing problem. It is no longer sufficient for him to say that there is no alternative. There are plenty of alternatives.

My constituency and the north-west in general are composed of brave, hard-working people who have not stood still as times have changed. The industrial relations records of Bury, Tottington and Ramsbottom are second to none. People there have played their part and accepted the need to change their old industries. They are living up to their side of the bargain and they are looking for a sign that the Government have confidence in them. A wider perception of the Government's interventionist role and investment by the Government in the kind of industry and infrastructure that will truly boost the recover of the north-west will show my constituents that their sacrifices have not been in vain. Above all, they look for a display of open-mindedness by those in charge of Government economic policy and a willingness to seek all the options available to defeat unemployment, a fresh look at the PSBR and an understanding that, as times and conditions change, so, too, can economic policies and aims. All those things would be welcome and would reassure my constituents and others in the north-west that their problems are not just recognised but on their way to being solved.

In essence, it comes down to this. The Government must never lose sight of the fact that economic policy is only a means to an end, not an end in itself. If the Conservative party and the Conservative Government do not exist to improve the condition of the people in a variety of ways, through their handling of the economy and their all-round policy, they are out to achieve nothing at all. Conservative Governments — and this one is no exception — have a fine record of social reform, of following a variety of economic theories and of showing a pragmatic grasp of the aspirations of the people which has enabled them to retain the trust of the people. In the cause of material and spiritual advancement, economic theory is a fine servant of Governments, but it is a dreadful master.

9.7 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): It is interesting to note the cool reception of both the Queen's Speech and the autumn statement by those who have hitherto acquiesced in every folly of the Government's economic policy. In so far as there was any economic message in the Queen's Speech, it received a very cool reception from Conservative Back Benchers who are at last beginning to realise that something is disastrously wrong. It also received a cool reception from that sycophantic body, the CBI, and the leaders of British industry, whose main economic preoccupation so far has been to clamour for more of the rod for their own backs and more of the machinery for the destruction of their own industries. Bought off with knighthoods and tax cuts, they acquiesced in all the Government's previous follies. Both those groups are now beginning to turn against what the Government are doing.

The worms are truly beginning to turn—a generic description from which I exclude the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt), although he was certainly turning quite dramatically. The worms are turning because they see that the Chancellor is trapped. The Government's whole economic strategy has led them into a trap from which it is virtually impossible to escape—the trap of trying to talk up, by sheer pressure of exhortation, an economic revival which obstinately refuses to flicker into life while at the same time implementing policies directly harmful to any possible revival and to the productive manufacturing sector of the economy. The pound is still substantially overvalued against the currencies of our principal competitors, especially West Germany but also Japan. Our export prices as against those of West Germany are 45 per cent. higher than they were in the last quarter of 1976. It is almost impossible for British industry to overleap that competitive barrier in any circumstances.

Competitiveness is eroded still further as a direct result of Government policies, and the increase in the cost of power and fuel has become another burden on British industry — a burden amplified by labour costs. The Government have made a fetish of labour costs, but have not told us that, even under their policies, unit labour costs have increased by about 7 to 8 per cent. as against the last quarter of 1982. In the same period, in the United States, thanks to the expansion that has gone on there, unit labour costs have come down about 6 per cent. Unit labour costs have fallen in West Germany. In this country they have gone up, and that is a competitive gap that puts the Government in a trap. Either they allow the pound to come down, to erode that competitive gap, or they continue the long-term comparative decline that has gone on for so long.

The Government are also imposing the burden of high interest rates. Unusually, interest rates failed to come down, in their annual ritual, in time for the Tory party conference to allow the Government to give a little good news to their supporters. They could not praise themselves then because interest rates had not come down from the insane levels to which they were misguidedly increased in July. It is no good the Government claiming that the recent news on interest rates is good, because the real level of interest rates is still at an unprecedented level, and interest rates are a crippling burden on investment, industry and the whole economy. That burden will make it difficult for expansion to be resumed.

The Chancellor is trapped in the same cupboard in which too many Chancellors have been trapped—I do not mention their names because a number of them have been Labour Chancellors. Perhaps it is not a cupboard but a coalhole, because the Chancellor will almost certainly blame the miners for his problems, but the fact that he is trapped is inescapable. The tragedy is that the country is trapped at a far lower level of economic health and vigour than at any previous time, because of the enormous harm and destruction that have been inflicted on the economy by policies that have been directly harmful to its core—manufacturing industry. Manufacturing industry provides so much of our ability to survive, and it used to provide many of the jobs.

The harm that has been done makes it difficult for us to survive in the position to which the Chancellor has reduced us. He has taken us into his trap with a real level of unemployment of about 4 million. We are a net manufacturing importer, instead of the workshop of the world and the exporter that we used to be. He has taken us there as the balance of payments benefit of North sea oil has been frittered away into the predictable deficit position.

We are in that trap despite the examples of how to deal with economic difficulties that have been proffered to us by all too many countries overseas, which are either ignored by the Chancellor or described as manifestations of original sin. I give as instances Sweden, where a 16 per cent. devaluation has led to a substantial rate of growth and a fall in unemployment, Australia, where a 10 per cent. devaluation has produced both those results, and, more importantly, the United States, which is often quoted.

After two years of trying to implement similar fiscal policies to those of our Government, President Reagan reversed those policies. President Reagan is the only Keynesian economist left in the world who does not have grey hair because he has been following the policy of Keynesian expansion by deficit financing that many of us would wish to be followed here. The result has been the generation of 6 million real jobs which are paying real money to people to participate in the economic advance of their country by policies which the Chancellor tells us are impossible and directly harmful in Britain.

It is clear from that failure to learn from examples overseas that the Government's economic policy is now a busted flush. It is exhausted. Unless the policies are reversed—the Chancellor is not the most adept and flexible person at learning lessons and is not the most willing person to admit when he is wrong—all that faces the country and the Government is a prolonged downhill slide while other countries advance, prosper and grow.

The Government have given us the exact reverse of the policies that are necessary to deal with an economy in comparative decline, turning to absolute decline, as it was, as world trade faltered. They have given us confrontation where we needed corporatism; cuts where we needed Keynes; an export of capital on an enormous scale when we needed investment in the productive strength of Britain; high interest rates when we needed cheap money; over-valuation when we needed a competitive pound; and free market economics when we needed management, planning and growth. The only way out of that trap is to reverse the policies; otherwise, there will be a long three-year slide downhill for the Government.

9.15 pm

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): We have come a long way verbally since, with customary glitter and glamour, the Queen's Speech was first read from the Throne in the other place a week ago. The debate that has followed has been wide-ranging. I would not wish for a moment to understate the importance of the debates on health and social security, local government and transport, nor on disarmament and foreign affairs, but it is only right to say that the main focus of the debate has been the state of the economy, both domestic and international, and, above all, the levels of unemployment in the United Kingdom.

We have had during the day a number of notable contributions to our debate. We heard the wise words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) on how to settle the long-standing mining dispute, or at least what attitudes of mind to bring to that solution—sentiments rightly echoed by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer). It will be well worthwhile for Ministers to study those words in Hansard tomorrow.

We have also had a timely reminder of the crucial importance of the international debt problem and what we all owe to the American economic expansion from the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins). We too easily fail to recognise just how much of the expansion in world output, including British output, which has taken place this year, we all owe to the American expansion. The right hon. Gentleman was right to say that that hectic pace of expansion cannot be sustained, that it would be wrong if it were sustained, and that, therefore, unless we in Britain and other countries of similar weight in the EEC are prepared to take up the baton of expansion, the world economy is likely once again to fall into a no-growth position, at any rate in 1985-86.

There is no prospect of Third world countries being able to carry the weight of the international debt which weighs so heavily on so many of them unless the markets of the western world are expanded. Otherwise, those countries simply cannot earn the exports and the revenues from exports which they need to service the ever-growing mountain of debt. The right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) made a striking contribution. He spoke for most Opposition Members and for many Conservative Members when he deplored the clipping and paring of overseas aid moneys and of other external services at a time when not only Ethiopia but much of sub-Saharan Africa face an historic catastrophe. He also hit a responsive chord when he rightly said in relation to Ministers' frequently expressed concern about unemployment that their action was not commensurate with their concern. The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley) made the same point succinctly, when he said that the Government give the impression that they do not sufficiently care.

On Thursday evening we tabled our amendment regretting that

"the Gracious Speech reaffirms policies which have already done severe damage to the British economy and will, in the future, further hold back the prospects of economic recovery."

Nothing that I have heard today from the Chancellor and certainly nothing that I have read in the autumn statement has given me any reason to change my mind about the relevance and accuracy of our amendment.

[Mr. Peter Shore]

What those damaging policies are is now all too familiar to hon. Members. They are policies to deflate the economy, and thus to run it at a far lower rate of growth of output and a far higher rate of unemployment than would otherwise be necessary. These policy aims have been achieved first by the imposition of money supply targets which have necessitated high interest rates. Secondly, those high interest rates have in turn encouraged a high exchange rate, thus making exports—except to the United States—more expensive and imports cheaper than they would otherwise be. Thirdly, deflation has been promoted by the continued cuts in public expenditure, cuts that have damaged the quality of community services and radically reduced capital investment in the infrastructure of our community. Fourthly, deflation has been pursued by a massive increase over the five years as a whole in total taxation — direct and indirect combined — with the greatest increases falling upon those with the smallest incomes, and the only reliefs being enjoyed by the very rich.

No country in the Western world had deflated more fiercely or, to use the technical term, tightened its fiscal stance more seriously, than Britain. Not surprisingly, Britain has suffered both the highest increases in unemployment and the lowest increases in output as a consequence. Those deflationary policies are restated in stark terms in the Gracious Speech in the following words:

"My Government will continue to pursue policies founded on sound money and lower public borrowing and aimed at securing a further reduction in inflation."

When those policies were first embarked upon, in 1979, it was the Government's contention that once inflation had been reduced, the economy would spontaneously resume growth and job creation. Prosperity and real jobs were, and according to the Government have always been, "just around the corner."

In November 1980, when unemployment stood at 1,600,000, the Prime Minister told us:

"We are reaching the trough of the recession and it will start to turn up towards the end of next year."

In the following year, in June 1981, the Prime Minister told the House:

"There are now clear signs that the worst of the recession is over."—[Official Report, 24 June 1981; Vol. 7, c. 332.]

Unemployment then stood at 2·5 million. In the Government's third year of office, in March 1982, the Prime Minister assured us, and an audience in Harrogate, that "after three years of battling, we are beginning to see the regeneration of our economy".

Unemployment then stood at 2,900,000. In their fourth year of office, in May 1983, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was telling us:

"There is every prospect that by next year we will see the start of the fall in the level of unemployment."

Unemployment then stood at 3,100,000. Now, in the Government's fifth year of office, in September 1984, unemployment has reached 3,284,000, which is the highest figure ever reached in our history. It is higher even than in the very depths of the world recession in the early 1930s.

We are dealing not with one or two years but with five years of continued failure; of policies stubbornly and stupidly adhered to long after the damage and folly has been demonstrated to all. How fitting it is, therefore, that the Chancellor should end his speech today with the resounding affirmation that his was a "long-term" policy. How fitting it is that the Leader of the House, in a BBC interview about the Queen's Speech last week should conclude his remarks with the assertion "patience is a great virtue in politics"

and

"in the long run we are all dead."

Against that background of unchanged deflationary policies, proudly reaffirmed in the Queen's Speech, and the scandalous level of unemployment, we must judge the sincerity of what the Government have to say about the plight of the jobless.

The Queen's Speech states:

"my Government remains deeply concerned about unemployment".

The right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East will agree that concern is nothing if it does not lead to, or express itself in, action. The truth is that the actions required to increase jobs in Britain are directly contrary to the Government's main economic policies.

The Prime Minister, as evidence of her good intentions, has recently taken to quoting selectively from the 1944 White Paper on employment policy in Britain by the late Lord Keynes. At her conference in Brighton she had the impertinence to claim that the 1944 White Paper policies were basically the same as hers. When she opened the debate on the Queen's Speech a week ago the right hon. Lady tried again and quoted from the first and central paragraph of that White Paper to which she had previously not referred. She quoted from that paragraph in reply to a question by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) who asked her whether she accepted

"the primary aim of maintaining a high and stable level of employment."

In her reply the Prime Minister said:

"The first paragraph of that White Paper says that the Government should 'accept as one of their primary aims . . . the maintenance of a high and stable level of employment after the war'."

The Prime Minister went on to say:

"As I said at my own party conference, I accept most parts of this Paper — pretty nearly all of it except those aspects which over time have changed.

We would all like to return to a low level of unemployment."—[Official Report, 6 November 1984; Vol. 67, c. 24.]

The Prime Minister failed to quote the whole of the first paragraph of that White Paper. It does not say:

"The Government accept as one of their primary aims the maintenance of a high and stable level of employment after the war."

It reads:

"The Government accept as one of their primary aims and responsibilities the maintenance of a high and stable level of employment after the war."

The right hon. Lady has sent me a note telling me that she cannot be here because she is entertaining the President of Finland. I regret that she is not here, because it is important that she should be aware of what she omitted to say and of my comments.

It is unbelievable that the Prime Minister should inadvertently delete that crucial word "responsibilities" when purporting to quote from the White Paper, because responsibility is the heart of the matter. It is at the heart of the White Paper. No Government before 1944 had accepted that responsibility. The dictionary definition of "responsibility" according to Chambers is "a trust or charge for which one is responsible."

The same problem afflicted the Secretary of State for Employment when he tried to intervene in the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) yesterday. In the debate on unemployment the Secretary of State said:

"I was asked by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) whether we had noted the first sentence in the 1944 White Paper. We have noted it, and I assure the House that we certainly want to see the highest possible employment level in this country". — [Official Report, 30 October 1984; Vol. 65. c. 1246.]

But to note is, once again, not to accept responsibility. We should ask the Leader of the House, who is to reply to the debate, the Chancellor and the Prime Minister, when she returns to the House on Thursday, whether the Government accept not only the aim but the crucial responsibility for the maintenance of a high level of employment, which was central to the 1944 White Paper and crucial to the whole economic policy of successive Governments from 1944 to 1979.

Let us consider what the Chancellor has said about responsibility for employment. Three weeks ago he was interviewed on television by Brian Walden. He was asked, as Mr. Walden put it, about carrying the can. The Chancellor replied:

"We have always made this clear what the Government can do to create jobs is very, very little indeed. It is largely a matter of how the economy works, which . . . in a free society depends on a whole myriad of decisions taken by the millions of workers, employers and managers up and down the country, that's what will determine how the jobs are. There is a little bit the Government can do to help them. What we can do we will do. But to fall into the error of thinking that the Government can determine the level of employment, that is totally false."

That is something that not only the Chancellor but the Prime Minister and the whole of the Treasury Bench believe. It is a convenient belief because, undoubtedly, a high level of unemployment assists the Government in keeping down inflation, in weakening the power of trade unions, in reducing pay claims and in redistributing income and wealth in favour of the well-to-do. Above all, that convenient doctrine exonerates the Government from blame and relieves them of their proper responsibility. But to describe these policies as stemming from the 1944 White Paper is a falsehood and a deception of the grossest sort.

There is a great hole in the middle of the Queen's Speech. The clamant problem of 1984 is the return of mass unemployment to our land. It has brought with it great suffering to individuals and communities, it has sharpened and increased industrial conflicts, it has actively destabilised our democratic system and it is alienating a whole generation of youngsters upon whom the brunt of the burden of unemployment has fallen. Yet the Queen's Speech has nothing to say that has the least relevance to their predicament. The autumn statement is, basically, a no-change document. As the document itself concedes, the present record level of unemployment will be sustained in 1985-86—the same appalling level as it has reached in 1984.

Since the productive potential of the economy is certainly not less than 2·5 per cent. per annum—that is the national increase in productivity per man at work—and as the predicted underlying growth rate in the autumn statement is 2·5 per cent., unemployment levels are bound to remain the same. If we are to bring down unemployment, and if the Government accept responsibility for a high and stable level of employment, we need a period of years during which the rate of growth is deliberately set at well above the productive potential, so that the unemployed total can be reduced. That is what has happened in the United States—a level of growth well above productive potential, well above the national increase in the labour force, and successful in bringing down the unemployment rate from well above 10 per cent. to just over 7 per cent. in less than two years.

There is plenty of room to discuss the pace and the pathway for the reduction of unemployment in the United Kingdom. However, that discussion will begin only when we have a Government who have the will and the wish to reduce unemployment and accept that they have a responsibility for maintaining a high and stable level of employment, and that will not be until we have got rid of the present occupants of the Treasury Bench.

9.35 pm

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): It is a week ago that the debate on the Gracious Speech and the Loyal Address was initiated with contributions of wit and perception by my hon. Friends the Members for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) and for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham). Since then the debate has been continued over a wide range of topics and today it has been set upon its concluding stages with a debate upon the economy that was initiated by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

I have had the advantage of listening to the most formidable troika of contributions from the right hon. Members for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) and for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym). I pay heartfelt thanks to them all for their collective efforts to prevent our occasion being entirely upstaged by the Earl of Stockton in another place. His performance must but be watched with envy and concern by the National Coal Board.

The contribution of my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East so excited me that I made a momentary intervention, which I hope he will not think in bad taste. I must tell my right hon. Friend that a year ago it was my privilege, in undertaking the same task that I now perform, to offer a message of personal congratulation, though from the Treasury Bench, on his speech on that occasion. That message was genuine. I hope that it will not lead to complications for him, at any rate, if I repeat my good wishes and congratulations. His speech elevated the level of debate in the Chamber and it will be remembered long after this day.

That said, I must say to my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East that I felt as though he had taken me by the elbow and propelled me to one of those better eating houses in the area of St. James. As I sat down I was passed the menu, and with the delicateness of those circumstances I found that it was rich in suggestion but devoid of prices.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Why did my right hon. Friend not go a la carte?

Mr. Biffen: I do not do that when I am a guest of my right hon. Friend. Confronted by a menu which was the pinnacle of social discretion, I had this fascinating vacuity where in grubbier minds details should have been evident. When it came to the wine, I needed no memory. The bouquet rushed to meet me; it was vintage 1970-74. I say to my right hon. Friend——

Mr. Rogers: When will the right hon. Gentleman address himself to unemployment?

Mr. Biffen: This is a friendly discourse. It is a good-natured reflection between friends, a characteristic that is unknown on the Opposition Benches. I say to my right hon. Friend that perhaps our next assignment will be at a Wimpy bar. However, I am certain that the areas he outlined for policy debate are the most legitimate of all and that they will persist throughout the Session.

The three main elements that I shall touch upon in the substance of my speech concern procedure, which is customary for the Leader of the House in replying to this debate. It will include also certain aspects of the Queen's Speech and the legislative tone of it, which is the heart of the debate and, finally, the general economic background against which we shall be transacting our business and which comprised the majority of the speech of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore).

I shall take account of procedural points raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), and will be in touch with him in due course.

The point on which I should like to detain the House for a moment is that about Opposition time. During the debate on the Queen's Speech it has become clear that there is continuing unease among Liberal and SDP Members over the present Standing Order governing the allocation of Opposition days.

That Standing Order, approved by the House in 1982, lays down that the use of the 19 Opposition days provided for should be at the disposal of the Official Opposition. Hitherto, there had been informal consultation between the Official Opposition and the other Opposition parties through the usual channels about the use of Supply days but the House declined to formalise these practices as in an amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). The events of the past few days have made it clear that these informal arrangements give rise to dissatisfaction on the Liberal-SDP Bench.

I am anxious to see whether progress can be made on this matter. I must, however, stress that the procedures of the House are determined by a majority of the House itself. It cannot be otherwise, and whatever new arrangements might require, an amendment of Standing Orders can only be put into effect by the consent of the House. In the first instance, there is merit in seeing whether the existing conventions over Opposition days can be reconsidered in the light of recent complaints. I hope, therefore, that an attempt might be made through the usual channels. I believe that such an attempt will be made in good faith.

If, however, no progress could be made that way, then I realise at once that there would be the need to involve the Procedure Committee again to consider this matter.

The House will realise that the Procedure Committee has already decided to undertake a major review of public Bill procedure. This work was set in hand at the request of the House. The Committee has decided that its energies should be first directed to this work.

However, the Procedure Committee may well feel that it can accommodate the feelings that have been expressed in this debate. The right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) has argued that I should "ask the Select Committee to put the issue at the top of its agenda for this Session".—[Official Report, 7 November 1984; Vol. 67, c. 120.]

I am sure that the House could not properly consider this matter without a report from the Select Committee. Meanwhile the right hon. Gentleman knows that the Select Committee is instructed by the House, and any approaches on my part should take account of that.

At this point, I should mention that I have been in touch with my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton, (Sir P. Emery) the Chairman of the Select Committee on Procedure. I know that he cannot be in his place today: parliamentary duties require him to be abroad. I have, however, been able to discuss the issue tentatively with him over the telephone. I shall be discussing the matter with him again when he has returned to this country next week.

Should circumstances so necessitate, I believe that the House should have the option of empowering the Committee to set up a Sub-Committee for the particular purpose of studying the allocation of Opposition days.

That said, I am sure that the whole House would agree with me that if at all possible this is a problem to be resolved through the usual channels. To my mind, that would be the more expeditious way of proceeding, but if that fails, then it is on this kind of problem that the House would rightly wish to look to the Procedure Committee for advice.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) rose——

Mr. Biffen: I apologise to the House for having detained it, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not press me. What I have just said is testimony of my good faith on this topic, and of the importance that I realise is attached to it on that Bench. I hope that it will be accepted as such.

The legislative load outlined in the Queen's Speech is broadly similar to last Session's load. Clearly, every Session leaves an imprint, and I have no doubt that the connoisseurs of multilateral political warfare will find that the legislation proposing the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties will reward them for all their interest. I have been reminded of that not merely by the Opposition.

Important though that legislation is, I remind the House of three other proposals contained in the Queen's Speech which deserve to be put in the balance and recorded in this debate. First, by any judgment, the Representation of the People Act is a major measure. It will significantly extend the franchise by providing for postal voting for holidaymakers and by extending the franchise to certain British citizens resident abroad. I am delighted that the legislation gives a handsome response to the recommendations of the Home Affairs departmental Select Committee for 1982-83. As Parliament is rooted in popular representation, I believe that there will be strong support for this measure, implying as it does a commitment to the ballot box.

Secondly, the Pensions Bill will be designed to improve the occupational pension rights of those who leave schemes before pensionable age. This is an increasing problem with greater labour mobility. This legislation is an advantageous social measure, and I am certain that the whole House will extend good will to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services in securing the passage of this measure.

The third item that I choose to demonstrate the utility of the Queen's Speech is the legislation that will be necessary for Hong Kong. That legislation is of great significance—I doubt that that point will be challenged in any quarter of the House—not only because of what it portends for Hong Kong but because of what it means for us. The legislation deals with an area of growing political and economic importance and of great consideration to our overseas interests. The manner in which and the dignity with which we are adjusting our status in Hong Kong betokens greater possibilities for enhancing our future influence in not only that area but the wider Asian area that it serves. Since so much of our foreign policy in a post-imperial age derives from influence rather than the normal exercise of power, the legislation is in every sense a testimony to the negotiating skills of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

If I hear murmurs of discontent from the Opposition —I do not include the alliance Benches, but refer to the Labour Benches—I make this point: it is difficult for many hon. Members to believe that this country finds itself as well beyond its boundaries as within. Perhaps a country of this maritime tradition finds itself never so well far beyond its boundaries as within. That is a message to be taken to heart.

Mr. Shore: It is a great pity that the right hon. Gentleman is left to quarrel with himself and to imagine that he is engaging the Opposition in some great controversy. He is not. The only matter causing restlessness among the Opposition is his failure so far to address himself to the major issues of the economy, including our high and growing unemployment.

Mr. Biffen: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his reassurance. I shall not disappoint him on the question of debate on the economy. I realise that it is much easier for the right hon. Gentleman to stand at the Dispatch Box to agree with me than it is for him to agree with most of those behind him.

The three Bills, serving as they do social issues, issues of parliamentary democracy and a wider national interest, are characteristic of this wise Queen's Speech. But, of course, in response to the invitation of the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney, I say at once that I refer to the economic background against which the politics of this Session will be conducted.

In the debate, we have heard frequent mention of unemployment. That is natural enough, with the jobless levels that we have experienced in recent years and that still persist. I shall, therefore, naturally comment upon that part of the debate. However, I shall make an initial reference to inflation. I appreciate that the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), who is the erstwhile shadow spokesman for Scotland, seemed to be worried that I would not discuss the issue of unemployment. I say this to the right hon. Gentleman. Any consideration of the Queen's Speech must have reference to the points that I have already made, and any reference to the economy must also have reference to the level of inflation. If Opposition Members have become unbalanced in their consideration of the matter, they cannot see it in that wider perspective.

Therefore, I make an initial reference to inflation. The success of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in securing an inflation rate of 4·7 per cent. is central to the Government's economic strategy. It represents a valuable step forward in securing a sense of realism in economic affairs, pay claims and settlements and generally in industrial relations. Indeed, it is the relative stability that comes with lower inflation that has enabled us to live with such high unemployment without a greater disruption of our social structure.

Meanwhile, my right hon. Friend is determined to build upon the success of lower inflation. He does so with the prospects of increasing national output, a prudent balance between spending and taxation and a promising outlook for British overseas trade.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Did the right hon. Gentleman write this?

Mr. Biffen: Every word that I say is well considered and well measured. It may be trite—that I do not deny —but it is the obvious nature of it that Opposition Members cannot accept—[Interruption.] Even so, there remains the issue of unemployment.

Mr. Rogers: This speech is like the Chancellor's tie —awful.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's speech was heard in silence. I ask him to give the Leader of the House a fair hearing.

Mr. Biffen: Even so, there remains the issue of unemployment. The fact that it is also a major problem with our trading partners and rivals offers no consolation. The social and economic challenge remains daunting. However, the problem is trivialised by the rhetoric so freely used from Opposition Benches. I invite the House to share with me both an analysis and a prescription for the present employment situation. First I refer to the analysis —of how the unemployment toll has climbed upwards of 3 million. Some have suggested that unemployment has been the instrument of Government policy. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] The very cheers from Opposition Benches that greet that remark show at what level Opposition Members are prepard to discuss such serious subjects.

There has been a crude slander that the Government created the present levels of workless to weaken trade unions. That argument is fantasy. Indeed, the reality, and not the fantasy, is that there are two major factors in our present unemployment situation. First, there is the demographic factor.

Mr. Straw: Ah.

Mr. Biffen: Is it denied that there is a demographic factor in unemployment?

Mr. Straw: Of course there are demographic factors in unemployment—though the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues always denied that when the Labour Government were in power.

Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why, while our inflation record is no better in relative terms than the records of our partners, our unemployment record is the worst of all the industrial nations? What is the answer to that?

Mr. Biffen: If the hon. Gentleman had had the pleasure of listening to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer making his autumn statement, he would know that my right hon. Friend rebutted that proposition in respect of our partners in the European Community. However, I am glad that we have elicited—not without difficulty — an acknowledgement of demographic factors. At least we have taken the debate a stage beyond the abuse that unemployment is a deliberate action of the Government and is designed to be a central part of their economic policy to harass working people.

The demographic factor of current relevance is the fact that the national work force has expanded by 400,000 since 1979, as those leaving schools and further education exceed those who are aging into retirement.

Firstly, there has been a massive transformation in the relationship between the work force and output. In 1983, the national output was almost identical to the figure for 1979, yet that identical output was being secured by a work force reduced by 1·7 million. Of course oil is a factor, but there has also been a productivity revolution, and the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth was generous enough to refer to that.

These are real considerations which help to explain a significant part of our current levels of unemployment. They also suggest that the new patterns of activity are more likely to come about if we abandon high-cost methods of production and follow the guides of competitive price and profit. That is the mainspring of the Government's policy.

Meanwhile, the Government have never denied the importance of public action and public funds in policies for employment. That has been particularly true in the ambitious training schemes we how have for young people. These are estimated to cost about £1,100 million in the current year.

Secondly, we have sought to change our fiscal structure to encourage the expansion of wealth-creating small businesses. We have also tried to shift the burden of corporate taxation so that it weighs less heavily on employment. The abolition of the national insurance surcharge was welcome and wise. It will do more to encourage, rather than penalise, employment.

Finally, we acknowledge that employment in Britain can best be secured within an open trading system and —no less important—with the political and economic alliances of the West. Indeed, it could hardly be otherwise for a nation exporting over 30 per cent. of its gross domestic product.

Yet we frequently hear cries from the Opposition Benches demanding protectionism and neutralism. Those cries can only harm our security, our trade and our employment. Therefore, I say to Labour Members that we will debate the issue of unemployment and the personal tragedies that it implies. But we will debate it by analysis and on policy, and not by generalised and extreme rhetoric.

The return of this country to greater employment will not be by some mechanical process. It cannot be gauged by some interlocking relationship with public spending or movements in inflation. As much as anything, it will be the product of social attitudes and business confidence.

It is a reality and not an abdication to assert that in these matters the authority of the Government is conditional and not absolute. That said, I have no doubt that the policies that I have outlined are well founded and will play their role in bringing about the return to work. In the debate on employment, as in so much else, the future belongs to us, and that is what this parliamentary Session will show.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Transport (Supplementary Grants)

10.43 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Transport (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I beg to move,

That the Local Government (Supplementary Grants for Transport Purposes Specified Descriptions) Order 1984, dated 18th October 1984, a copy of which was laid before this House on 22nd October, in the last Session of Parliament, be approved.

This is a joint order by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. It is made under section 51 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. I shall concentrate my remarks tonight mainly on the points concerning England. The changes proposed for Wales are minimal, but my hon. Friend the Minister of State is here to deal with any questions on the Welsh aspects of the order.

The order will bring into effect the proposals announced by my right hon. Friend last month to confine transport supplementary grant to capital expenditure on roads. First, a few remarks about TSG. It has been in existence for 10 years. The aim of the system devised then was to encourage county councils and the Greater London council to pursue suitable transport policies for their areas and to compensate them for costs that were high in relation to their populations.

TSG was intended also to enable central Government to provide support for large, local capital transport schemes without the drawbacks of the system of specified grants which it replaced. In other words, it helped to smooth out the uneven expenditure patterns that most road building has. TSG also enabled support to be given to public transport at a time when no adequate means existed to bring expenditure on public transport subsidies within the rate support grant system.

However, in recent years the TSG system has not been able to reconcile the need to constrain local authority expenditure with some authorities' policies for extravagant public transport subsidies. Nor has this form of TSG met the vital need for a sustained level of investment in major roads.

In 1983-84, in the expenditure which the Secretary of State accepted for TSG, excluding London, 28 per cent. was for capital investment, but less than 10 per cent. of the grant was spent in this way. The tendency for councils to use TSG to support current spending rather than capital investment has been increasing. In 1980-81 councils used about 63 per cent. of TSG to support current spending. In 1984-85 they budget to use 71·6 per cent. while 25 councils propose to use 100 per cent. of their grant to support current spending and use none of it on capital investment.

The planned level of road construction has often not been achieved. For example, local capital spending on roads fell short of the Government's plans by almost £32 million in 1981-82 and by £11 million in 1982-83. This fall in spending has had most noticeable effects on the larger schemes needed to further the main objectives for local roads set out in the White Paper "Policy for Roads in England: 1983", Cmnd. 9059, the primary route network, bypasses and urban roads. The extra support from the taxpayer nationally represented by TSG should be used to benefit the population at large who produce the money and not only those who live in a single local authority's area.

Although the system was intended to favour authorities with high expenditure needs in relation to their resources, it has been criticised for producing an unfair distribution between different parts of the country. For example, in 1984-85 London and the metropolitan county councils received 62 per cent. of the grant available, when they account for only 38 per cent. of the country's population. The present system has also been criticised for being unpredictable in its outcome from year to year.

The possibilities of a change to the system have been around for a couple of years. TSG was increasingly difficult to reconcile with the developing system of expenditure targets and rate support grant penalties. The establishment of London Regional Transport earlier this year meant that it would not be possible to make a sensible settlement for London under the present system. It became apparent that the changes would be needed for 1985-86.

We consider that the first priority for TSG is to focus grants more closely on roads-capital expenditure, so we encourage investment in road building; to give a greater incentive than under the threshold system which has been extremely complicated, and to give some guarantee of continued support for schemes as well as to achieve a fairer distribution of the money available; and to give priority to our objectives for local roads as set out in the White Paper. We also have to try to stop the leakage of grant given for capital expenditure going into current expenditure as I described.

My right hon. Friend outlined his ideas formally to the local authority associations in May this year. In July we wrote consulting them on a capital-only TSG limited to expenditure on highways and traffic regulation. The proposed grant will be paid at a flat rate of about 50 per cent. We propose to consider to what extent the roads and routes affected would be of more than local importance. We propose also to take into account whether people living or working in an authority's area would be relieved of the effects of heavy through traffic. We also said that we would specify the schemes in the programme. Provided progress is satisfactorily maintained we shall continue to support them in future years.

Current expenditure on roads and public transport will continue to be supported through the RSG block grant. It already is to a large extent. We shall devise new formalae for grant-related expenditures for public transport revenue support and for road maintenance with the local authority associations.

We have been concerned that the shift from TSG to RSG should produce a grant distribution which will, as far as possible, reflect councils' spending needs for public transport and road maintenance. The proposals will not result in changes in the resources available to local authorities nor any reduction in the total amount of exchequer grant available to them.

Investment in facilities for local public transport such as bus stations, bus depots and rail electrification schemes will no longer under this order be eligible for TSG, but we will pay specific grants under section 56 of the Transport Act 1968, towards large worthwhile projects to provide new facilities. Some hon. Members may recall that we have used section 56 to support the Tyne and Wear metro. That is the type of scheme for which it should be used.

My right hon. Friend and I have discussed these proposals with elected representatives, and officials have discussed the financial implications at a number of meetings with the associations. Having considered the outcome of the consultation, my right hon. Friend decided to seek the approval of Parliament to the necessary legislative changes.

The purpose of the order is to restrict payment of supplementary grant for transport in England to capital expenditure on highways and the regulation of traffic. In Wales, TSG will no longer be payable on parking. Financial support for parking will be provided from the RSG.

The Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 provides for different TSG systems in England and Wales. In 1981 the threshold system for Wales was ended and the eligibility for grant was restricted to capital expenditure on public transport, highways, the regulation of traffic, the provision of freight handling facilities and parking. This has been granted only for projects of high value. The order merely removes parking from eligibility. Thus, it makes no fundamental change to the arrangements already operating for Wales.

The legislative changes sought in the order will enable my right hon. Friend to operate the TSG system in the way that I have outlined. Article 4 confines TSG to expenditure in England in connection with highways and the regulation of traffic. Article 6 provides for the consequential amendments of section 6 of the Local Government Act 1974. It describes highways and the regulation of traffic as the transport matters qualifying for grant in England and changes the method of apportioning the grant from the threshold system.

The acceptance of expenditure for TSG has always been a matter for the Secretary of State's discretion. It is customary for him to say in circulars how he intends to use it in relation to authorities' transport programmes. The consultation paper and the circular issued on 22 October explained the criterion of more than local significance and how consideration would be given to such areas as the primary route network, urban roads and bypasses. These aspects can be dealt with under the discretion already available to my right hon. Friend. They do not, therefore, form part of the order.

The present TSG system has proved inadequate in a number of ways. It has not been able to prevent the use of the grant for extravagant public transport subsidies. It has not met the overriding need for investment in major road schemes. It has produced settlements which have been increasingly criticised as unfair and unpredictable.

The Government's proposals for changing the system which I have outlined will put an end to these inadequacies. They will enable Government support provided through TSG to be concentrated on roads which are of more than local significance. Day-to-day current expenditure on local roads or for general public transport subsidies are essentially local matters. Local authorities can best decide their own priorities for spending on these within the Government's targets for their overall expenditure and from the resources available to them, through the rates and RSG. Overall, local authorities will not be worse off as a result of these changes. Approval of this order will enable us to prepare a TSG settlement for 1985-86 on the new basis, which will enhance investment in new roads by local authorities. I commend the order to the House.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): We should be clear about the background to the order. It is not only an important order but a mean little order. It was spawned in spite and nurtured in complete ignorance of the wishes and interests of the truly elected members of the local authorities, and it has been brought before the House with indecent haste. The motion to approve the order should have been moved by the Secretary of State, because its effects will be felt well beyond any of the extraordinarily unimaginative phrases that have been used by the Minister of State to give the impression that the measure was demanded by all and welcomed throughout the country.

Let us be clear about what is happening in this order. By changing from the transport supplementary grant to the rate support grant system, the Government have in effect said, "In future, we shall be singularly uninterested in the views of anyone in any particular locality about his transport system. We believe that we should have control from the centre exercised so that local authorities find it extremely difficult to set priorities that are acceptable to their electorate." Let us understand that in future parking, rail freight and public transport revenue support will go into the rate support grant system. The percentage of spending to be paid centrally will fall from 55 per cent. in 1984-85 to 50 per cent. from April next year.

How do the Government justify that spurious argument? They say that there are two reasons for the change. They say that local authorities have been underspending their allocation for capital road projects, and that they intend to change that. Their claim is based on an estimate for 1982-83 that only £330 million of the allocated £469 million was spent. Those figures were later discovered to be inaccurate. In fact, the council spent £442 million, which is only a 6 per cent. underspend. Central Government have already allowed trunk road underspending of 5 per cent. to be carried over. That 1 per cent. extra is so important that we have to carry through a major change.

The Select Committee on Transport expressed its surprise at the Government's inaccuracy. The Committee called for more encouragement to use capital money, but said:

"we would not wish to endorse such a change until we were satisfied that adequate provision could be made through Rate Support Grant for the support of current transport expenditures".

We are told by the Minister of State that the order is intended to curb extravagant public transport schemes. In future, large worthwhile projects — presumably those decided upon by the Secretary of State — will be supported and others will not. We are told that the Secretary of State consulted the local authorities, although the speed with which this statutory instrument has been brought forward makes one wonder how much consultation has taken place. On top of that, the Secretary of State has obviously ignored the views of the local authorities themselves because they understand only too well that in future they will find it virtually impossible to provide from the rate support grant system for the absolutely necessary items of expenditure outside road spending.

Let us return to spending on roads. Apart from the fact that the Government's fears of low expenditure on road capital are entirely false, one will not encourage road capital if the percentage support is cut even further to 50 per cent. instead of 55 per cent. this year. There has been a 70 per cent. cut since the Government took power. The Government have already undermined all sections of transport through TSG cuts. The TSG for England was £499·1 million at today's prices in 1979-80, but this year it is £400 million. For Wales the capital-only scheme first appeared in 1982-83. Then TSG on roads capital alone was £30 million. In the next two financial years it rose to £31 million. That is a 5·5 per cent. cut in the allocation for roads capital, despite implementing a new system.

However, the real damage of this nasty little change can be seen only too clearly when one considers the effect that it will have on public transport, particularly British Rail. The passenger transport executives of the metropolitan counties have expressed strong concern that moving their grant into RSG can cause only direct cuts. Manchester passenger transport executive says that British Rail cuts will cause 25 per cent. reductions in train services. West midlands has predicted serious consequences.

While the PTEs are directly affected, British Rail is hit because section 20 of the Transport Act 1968 gives local authorities a duty to subsidise non-profitable services of British Rail. Without TSG, virtually all the rail lines within the metropolitan counties, excluding the inter-city services, will close if the cash cannot be found from elsewhere. British Rail stands to lose £80 million, or 10 per cent. of all its subsidies.

However, the Government say that they intend to reconsider any capital projects, even if they are allowed and accepted, that have not been scheduled for commencement before 1 April 1985. Therefore, many plans for capital road building are under threat from the measures, and all to try to solve a capital road building problem.

The extent of the chaos of the Government's thinking on transport is demonstrated only too clearly by a little incident that we witnessed today. The Prime Minister, standing at the Dispatch Box earlier on, was exceedingly scathing about a headline in a certain evening newspaper — which will get no extra publicity from me. The headline is: that is, London Transport. The Prime Minister said that she found that totally unacceptable. But what do we find when we study the article closely? It says:

"News of the pay-off with taxpayers' money will raise a storm of protest."

Notice that it is not local authority money, but taxpayers' money. What is the reason for that? It is made clear by the reporter. He states that the Left-wingers concerned

"were removed from office by Transport Secretary Nicholas Ridley almost before the ink was dry on the White Paper creating the new London Regional Transport Authority and separating it from GLC control."

The Secretary of State is responsible for that bizarre golden handshake. His deep contempt for locally elected people is such that he will not allow them to appoint to their own London Transport executive those who represent their views. The right hon. Gentleman is prepared to carry it so such lengths that he would rather that they went away with large golden handshakes than that they be allowed to play a part in deciding the future of London's transport system.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Did not the bandits at county hall appoint members of the Labour party to the London Transport executive only weeks before it was due to be abolished? Was not that an affront to common sense?

Mrs. Dunwoody: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand that, even with this Government, measures must be brought before the House before major changes can be introduced. The Secretary of State may ignore the views of the London electorate, but the Labour party is aware of its responsibility to the electorate at every level.

Let us be clear what this is all about. We are not talking about a more efficient system or saving money for the taxpayer. Roads are virtually the only part of the Department of Transport's work that has not been but by the Government since 1979. Motorway spending is up by £400 million—37·8 per cent. faster than prices. Even local authority road-related spending has risen 7 per cent. in real terms or £387 million in cash terms. Yet the Government's justification for this tatty little measure and for taking away local authorities' rights to spend money on revenue support is based on the claim of underspending on roads by local authorities.

At the same time, central funding for local bus, underground and ferry services has fallen by 37 per cent., which is the equivalent of £143 million being taken away from those services since April 1984. The Minister of State ought not to present us with wholly spurious arguments. She does not believe them and we do not believe them. We shall vote against the order to show the electorate the mean and petty attitude of the Government towards local transport.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): As one who has advocated for several years the change that we are discussing, I naturally welcome the order.

I should have thought that Opposition Members who represent Welsh constituencies would reflect on the excellent road building programme that has been started in many parts of Wales since the changes introduced by the Welsh Office. I have been to the Principality to see the excellent schemes underway there, particularly in Cardiff where there is a scheme to help with the new port facility and industrial development in the city. Much money that would otherwise not have been available has been spent in Wales.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Will the hon. Gentleman accept that the new schemes in Wales have been implemented at the expense of schemes that have been in the plans for years? Areas have been blighted because of uncertainty about whether schemes would go ahead and many towns and villages that needed bypasses have lost them. It has been an absolute mess and it needs to be sorted out.

Mr. Fry: The hon. Member is merely saying that more money should be spent on roads in Wales. I agree, but expenditure is a matter of priorities and we all wish that we had more money for our own constituencies.

Contrary to the impression given by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), whom I welcome to her new responsibilities, the Select Committee on Transport made it clear that it was sympathetic to the proposed changes. I am a member of the Select Committee, and I think that the hon. Lady's quotations from our report were selective and gave a wrong flavour to the report.

[Mr. Fry]

Surely the Opposition cannot accept that local authorities should be allowed to put in bids for TSG based on fictitious figures. They often put in amounts for road building and maintenance without having any intention of spending the money for that purpose. They wished to divert it to other purposes. Before hon. Members descend upon me with rods, they should recall that when there was a Labour Secretary of State for Transport, he complained bitterly about the activities of some Labour-controlled authorities, such as South Yorkshire, which pursued policies which were at variance with the bids that they put in. It is unacceptable for bids to be put in on a spurious basis, and it therefore makes sense that the suggested change should take place.

However, I wish to make two reservations. When the Select Committee made its report upon road maintenance, we were somewhat concerned about the amount of money being spent, particularly on urban local roads. It seemed to us that there was a danger that insufficient moneys would be forthcoming for the renewal and repair of those roads which in many towns were falling into a serious state. I want therefore to utter a word of caution. Enough money must be put into the rate support grant to ensure that there is no danger of continued deterioration.

Secondly, I feel that this measure may be the first of a number of measures which may affect local transport during this Parliament. My views on the matter are well known. My hon. Friend the Minister of State and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State must be aware of the charge that is likely to be made that the changes that they are trying to effect—the sum total of changes this year—are likely to mean that many local authorities will be forced to make difficult decisions, particularly about the level of revenue support. If the Government are determined that there shall be no deterioration in public transport, the support that will be offered to local authorities, once all the legislation has been passed, must be spelt out more clearly.

It is because I believe that the present measure cannot be considered purely on its own that I have those reservations. When we discuss legislation on buses, Opposition Members may be surprised by the way in which I shall vote; but we are not doing so now. We should give the Government the benefit of the doubt, and support the measure. If, later on, it appears that the measure has been used simply to make it more difficult for local authorities to support public transport, I may find myself casting my vote differently when we vote on some larger measure. I have not been afraid to do so in the past and I shall not be afraid to do so again.

I hope that the House will approve the order, but I also hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends have taken note of my words of caution.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I apologise for not having been present when the Minister of State began her speech. I must say that I have grave doubts about the order. While on the whole I accept that it makes sense, when one changes the rate support grant to a block system, to do away with transport supplementary grant, the uncertainty about what is to happen will mean that local authorities will feel worried about what is in store for them.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) drew our attention to the problem of the passenger transport executives. They do not know what the situation will be in the west midlands or the north-east or on Merseyside. Will enough money be forthcoming to enable them to support British Rail under Section 20 of the 1968 Transport Act? We do not know. The measure has been introduced far too early. It should have been introduced after some definite statement from the Secretary of State for the Environment.

The Minister of State visited my constituency earlier this year. She must already know that doing away with transport supplementary grant will place us in considerable difficulty.

One of the criteria laid down in the order is whether expenditure is on a primary route network. We have no such network, as the Minister well knows. The second is whether the road is a major urban road of more than local significance. It could be argued that all capital highway expenditure on the island is of local significance only. The third is whether the expenditure is for a bypass which would relieve local communities of the effects of heavy lorries. I openly admit that that is not as great a problem in my constituency as elsewhere. We are therefore worried whether, after abolition of TSG, we shall be treated as fairly as when it was in operation.

During the past few years our transport policy plan has met with a fair response from the Government. We have had a good allocation, but can the Minister say in all sincerity that having done away with TSG she can guarantee that, under the block grant system, we shall do so well? I gravely doubt whether she can. Therefore, with reluctance, I cannot support the order. I say that although I supported the change in the grant system introduced by the former Secretary of State for the Environment. It was right to change the block grant system and it is only sensible to do away with TSG now and to put it in the block grant. However, the change is premature and the Government should have given us some guarantee before introducing the order. We and passenger transport executives have great difficulties accepting that we shall be as well served by the new system as by the old one.

Sir Paul Hawkins (Norfolk, South-West): I greatly welcome the change because I lost a bypass around my home town. It badly needs that bypass but lost it because the county council spent the money on other things. This order is a move in the right direction for my constituency and other parts of Norfolk, if not for the Isle of Wight. Many other hon. Members lost grant to build bypasses and to carry out major improvements on major roads between the midlands and the north and the East Anglian ports. We badly need more trunk and county council roads and I am convinced that many schemes have been lost because county councils have used transport supplementary grant intended for bypasses around small market towns that are almost shattered by huge vehicles for other purposes. For that reason, I wholly support the order.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I agreed with much of what the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Fry) said, except towards the end of his speech when he said that he would support the order. I shall certainly not do that. Transport supplementary grant has been hijacked and bids for capital have not been spent on capital. Policies that have been bid for should be carried out. However, keeping capital spending on its own and shoving revenue spending in with the rest of the block grant would be all right if we had a real democracy. Unfortunately, we do not. Local government has no chance of acting independently. It is constrained by holdback and the rest. It is shackled hand and foot by the Government. If that were not so I should have every confidence in revenue spending being left in with block grant as councils could then make their own choices about priorities. Under present conditions we shall have little revenue spending.

In regard to the railways, local authorities are likely not to take a strategic view of rail implications. The chances are that revenue spending under section 20 of the Transport Act 1968 will decline. The same will be true for passenger transport executives. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) made that point. It is likely that the type of integrated transport system which we have in the metropolitan councils will disappear because of the limitations and restrictions placed on local authorities.

British Rail will be worried about the order. According to my figures, section 20 grants amount to about 5 per cent. of its revenue income. That will decrease. It will have more difficulty in meeting the objectives which the Secretary of State set last year.

I am worried about the implications of the order for the maintenance of roads. If a council is pressed for cash, it will not resurface roads, but postpone the work for a year. Hon. Members must understand that that is what will happen. If restrictions on a local authority are not lifted, it will postpone the work for a further year. That will increase the dangerous state of the roads, and make it difficult for us to move goods. Most of our goods are moved by road. It will make life difficult for motorists and especially for motor cyclists.

What assurances can the Minister give the House about maintenance programmes for roads? Even if she can assure us, I shall vote against the order because it is wrong for the railways, because strategic decisions will not be taken in district areas and because there will not be an integrated transport policy in metropolitan areas. Can the Minister assure the House that road maintenance programmes will be maintained?

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): I also welcome the hon. Lady the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) to her new responsibilities. She launched into her first speech with the bland understatement now characteristic of her style. I look forward to a continuation of that moderation which is her hallmark.

If the Secretary of State for Social Services had come to the House this evening with a proposal that a social services supplementary grant should be set up and the Government should earmark moneys for social services and restrict local authorities to spending those funds, Opposition Members would, quite rightly, have said that it represented an infringement of local democracy and that the ideal for local government spending was to give local government an overall sum to spend as it determined.

There is an argument for abolishing transport supplementary grant altogether, but my hon. Friend the Minister has not gone as far as that. She simply seeks to restrict the area controlled by the Government to capital spending. Has the case for maintaining Government purchase over capital spending been well made? I believe that it has. In too many areas transport spending has been twisted into social policy, and funds allocated for transport purposes have been used to redistribute wealth.

I am not against the redistribution of wealth—both parties spend most of their time redistributing wealth in one way or another—but I do not believe that taking money away from people and giving them free or cheap bus tickets in return is a sensible way of redistributing wealth. For that reason, I do not believe that moneys allocated for transport purposes are being properly used when they are used simply to subsidise public transport.

I was specially encouraged by my hon. Friend the Minister's comments about section 56 grant. Not all capital spending on transport will be spending on public works. All kinds of useful investments can be made in our public transport system—in roads, in railways and in buses—which do not involve public works. We should remember that there is capital investment in public transport just as much as in roads and that in both cases it is not the same as subsidising fares.

For all those reasons, I believe that the proposed changes are sensible and I shall certainly support them.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): Many local authorities are worried about passenger revenue support in view of the problems involved in the present system of grant-related expenditure assessment. For instance, there is the anomaly that the grant for museums and art galleries is based on the square footage of the area's central shopping facility. The transfer to the grant system of revenue support for public transport, a bigger and more important aspect of local government, therefore worries many authorities a great deal. A large number of authorities run systems beyond their own areas, providing services for neighbouring authorities which do not have undertakings of their own, while others rely on the National Bus Company and other undertakings.

I believe that the proposed system is ill thought out and has been too hastily introduced. If it has to go through, local authorities and others responsible for running public transport will need to be assured that the same level of revenue support will be available so that services can be maintained, especially in rural areas and other areas of difficulty. If the level of support is not maintained, the public transport system will be endangered throughout the country.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): I am surprised at the Opposition's strong resistance to these proposals. I thought that there was a consensus in the House on the need for more capital spending on roads—for environmental reasons, especially spending on bypasses for heavy lorries, for reasons of investment for industry and, above all, for employment reasons. The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) disagreed with the figures produced by my hon. Friend the Minister, but I think that both sides agree that local authorities have underspent in terms of capital spending.

Areas such as my constituency in rural Lincolnshire have suffered from the emphasis that larger authorities, especially in south Yorkshire, have placed on what my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris) described as using transport policy as a means of social policy and thus misusing the transport supplementary grant. When I was a member of the GLC, the Conservative administration were thinking in terms of using the grant for the Jubilee line, capital investment in the east end, and so on, but the grant has been misused by the current GLC administration.

My area has suffered from the lack of capital investment. Although Lincolnshire has more miles of road per head of population than any other county, we still have severe environmental problems in the Trentside villages and with the A46. The village of Dunholme has waited 40 years for a bypass. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, although London has 38 per cent. of the population, it gets 62 per cent. of the grant. Rural areas such as the one that I represent will welcome this order, and for that reason I shall vote for it tonight.

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): The problem with a measure such as this is that it comes in the context of proposals affecting local government. In rapid succession, there have been increasing penalties and restrictions on local government expenditure. The Government have had many objections to local government expenditure proposals in the past few months. There have been problems in the negotiations on the formula for grant related expenditure, and penalties have been applied there. The Government have become increasingly persistent in interfering with local government, which is an elected part of our constitution, and which has the right to a say in the determination of its own affairs.

For Wales, there is a modification of the transport-related grant. For England, there is a wholesale transfer from transport-related grant to rate support grant, leaving, for the determination next year and each succeeding year, only the highways and the regulation of transport operations in the local authority areas.

The amount of money involved nationally is relatively small, but at local level it is of increasing importance. There is not sufficient evidence—although I have read some of the Select Committee reports, and have gone into the matter carefully—to suggest that local authorities are misusing their bids for transport supplementary grant. There may be some cases of this, but there is no perfection, either here or in any part of local government. We have to deal with our responsibilities by making shrewd judgments. A local authority should be allowed some flexibility of judgment in the overall finances available to it.

In this order, the Government are being rather petulant. A local authority may decide, after making a bid, and succeeding in getting it, that there is a need in that period for some other priority — a practice that has been acceptable hitherto. Why the sudden discovery that it is wrong? Here is another instance of promises made in the 1979 and 1983 election manifestos of non-intervention going out of the window. The Government have become the biggest interferers that I have known since I entered political life. They are here making a dishonest prospectus for the country.

The issue of transport in London has to be related to the future of the GLC. All that the Government wanted to do from the outset was to get rid of the GLC. They knew that if they did that alone, they would be charged with political nepotism and so they decided to include the metropolitan counties in their abolition plans. They are interfering with the PTAs, and are forcing through this order.

It is not fair to either side of the House to have an order such as this, which is incomprehensible on first reading. The short explanatory note does not deal with the whole problem that we are facing. We shall have a vote tonight, yet hon. Members cannot honestly say that we have had an in-depth debate on matters of great importance to local authorities.

With approximately 20 Bills to come before the House this Session we are becoming so legislatively constipated that we shall not make much sense of the real affairs of Britain. I hope that the Government will understand that some people are saying that enough is enough and that, when elected, local authorities have a right to determine their own affairs without forever going cap in hand to a Secretary of State, and this Secretary of State in particular, because his only hallmark is his persistence to outdo his own Prime Minister.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): In the short time available to me, I want to say that if the Department of Transport intends to take out of the hands of local authorities decisions about priorities, for heaven's sake let us make sensible decisions in each individual case rather than laying down grandiose rules.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State, whose attention I hope to attract for just two minutes, will know that for some time I have taken the view that, instead of building a trunk road from Fairmile to Exeter, that bypasses nothing, the same amount of money in the same constituency could be spent on bypassing Crediton. No danger points are removed by spending a huge amount of money on a trunk road diversion which does nothing except go through good land and ruin a number of businesses. On my hon. Friend's criteria the same money would be much better spent — if my hon. Friend is taking away the power to make decisions on those criteria from local authorities—on bypassing a town which, for a mile and a quarter, is utterly ruined by through traffic.

I know that it is difficult for the Minister to sort through her papers before she replies, but if she is taking away from local authorities the choice of priorities, she really must listen to her colleagues if decisions are to be made by Government instead. That is my message to her which I hope that she has time to hear.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It is a great pity that the Secretary of State cannot find the time to stay with us for an hour and a half. Perhaps he has nipped off to plug himself into his life support machine for a while.

Conservative Members seem to think that the order will somehow be good for transport in Britain. It has nothing to do with the efficient ordering of the transport system in Britain. We saw that in the London Regional Transport Bill. It is all to do with the further centralisation of Government powers and with assisting the roads lobby.

The Labour party's criticisms of the order can be put simply and straightforwardly. First, it undermines the original intention and purpose of the transport supplementary grant system. Secondly, it has been rushed through in undue haste.

The Minister said that the Secretary of State consulted local authorities. Yes, indeed he did. But the local authorities were not consulted until July. What was their reaction? Of course, we all know the answer. They were very much opposed.

Thirdly, there is the financial impact on the local authorities. Before the Secretary of State left to go elsewhere, he accused my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) of not doing her homework. The Minister might like to comment when she replies on some figures that I have. The allocation of transport supplementary grant under the new system looks as though it will take about £45 million away from the shire counties, which is a 30 per cent. reduction. There will be £29 million taken away from the metropolitan counties and £23·7 million taken away from the GLC—a 50 per cent. reduction overall. It is impossible to see how that is geared to assisting those authorities to meet their transport needs. Of course, the Minister is really saying —and will no doubt claim further—that overall the councils will not be worse off, because the aggregate Exchequer grant is determined independently of the total of TSG. Although the TSG will be reduced, the amount of RSG block grant will be correspondingly greater But we know just how easy it is for the Secretary of State to manipulate the block grant system.

Dr. Marek: There is possibly one good point about the changes being made, and that is that as capital will remain under the TSG the Government could put money in, and then increase construction thus reducing unemployment. However, that is sadly probably not the Government's intention.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Wait and see.

Mr. Banks: There is too much of a wait-and-see attitude towards capital allocations for local authorities. One difficulty about underspends on capital outlays, which has been mentioned by the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh), lies in the one year basis of the programme. It is difficult for local authorities to know exactly what to do when dealing with a one-year programme that can be changed at will by Ministers. That is what is making local government so difficult to run. There is an increasing amount of intervention by central Government.

Perhaps the Minister will tell us how local authorities can be sure that they will get additional moneys through the block grant system. We should all be extremely grateful for that knowledge. We know how that block grant system has been, and is being, manipulated by Ministers. Indeed, it will continue to be manipulated by them. In effect, on the revenue side, the TSG system is being replaced by the block grant system. We do not believe that that will be good for transport, because the Government are manipulating the block grant system to suit their short and long-term political objectives.

Whilst on the subject of political objectives, I should add that I saw the story in The Standard tonight about the golden handshakes being given to the so-called Left-wingers sacked from the London Transport board. The article makes no mention of the fact that the Secretary of State then packed the London Regional Transport board with his own appointees who are no doubt totally non-political and not in any way interested in the right hon. Gentleman's policies.

Perhaps the Minister will tell us the difference between the salaries of Mr. John Telford Beasley, who has just been appointed as the new managing director of buses, and his predecessor. I notice that he is to receive a £41,000 salary. I also notice that he has many transport connections. He was an international business man with an American pharmaceutical company based in the Mediterranean before he joined London Transport. I do not quite see how that is relevant to running London Transport.

I also notice that Mr. Telford Beasley is coming up to Waterloo by train. He says that he will take a bus from Waterloo to Victoria. What a breadth of experience of LT he will gain from that trip. He says:

> "I don't see any point in having a limousine waiting for me every day at the station, when there is a very efficient bus service. I will use it every day, and I can get talking to the passengers and find out what they think of the service at first hand."

Mr. Telford Beasley will not have much chance of doing that while riding from Waterloo to Victoria—a distance that any other person would try to walk. No doubt we shall all be hearing a lot more of Mr. John Telford Beasley. How much bigger is his salary than his predecessor's? Is it true that he is a personal friend of Dr. Bright, the chairman of London Regional Transport and that that was why he was appointed? I believe that Dr. Bright was very knowledgeable about making Dad's Cookies before he was translated into the chairman of LRT. Where are all these people coming from? From where did they gain their knowledge and experience of the transport needs of London?

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) was rather scathing about the appointment of the new manager for London Transport bus services, Mr. John Telford Beasley. My hon. Friend referred to him as an American business man with no experience of London Transport. My hon. Friend was being a little unfair, because the Tory party has a weakness for American business men and appoints them to its nationalised industries with no great record of success. I hope that the new appointment will be more successful than that other well-known and well-paid American business man that they appointed to run the mining industry.

The hon. Member for Norfolk, South-West (Sir P. Hawkins) expressed concern about the number of bypasses that have been cancelled because of the subsidy to public transport in Norfolk. He sat down before we had a chance to intervene, but I should be delighted to give way to the hon. Gentleman if he could tell me one bypass that has been cancelled in his county because of the concentration by the Norfolk county council on public transport, bearing in mind that Norfolk is one of the much—heralded trial areas for the proposed bus legislation.

Sir Paul Hawkins: Bypasses were not built in Downham Market where I live. Fakenham was mentioned in the list of places which could have had money spent on it by the Ministry of Transport. I never mentioned anything about expenditure on public transport. I said that the money which should have been spent on capital grants was spent elsewhere, not necessarily on public transport.

Mr. Snape: That will not do. It is all very well for the hon. Gentleman to say that money could have been spent in a particular way, but did the county council pay for support for the Downham Market bypass — a place which I know, but not as well as the hon. Gentleman? Is there a reason why a much-needed bypass has not been built and why money is being spent on bus services? The hon. Gentleman fails to prove his case. If that is the reason for the way in which he casts his vote tonight, I hope that in future he will consider proposed legislation more carefully.

I hope that the Minister will concentrate on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). What on earth will happen to rail services protected by section 20 grants? The House deserves a reply. I hope that the hon. Lady will not accuse local authorities of scaremongering. I hope that she will accept that they are genuinely worried about their future. I hope that she will allay our anxieties.

I listened intently to the contributions by the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) during the passage of the London Regional Transport Bill. I tried to like him a little more in Committee, but I had some difficulty doing so. I do not wish to be personal, but I liked him slightly less after hearing his contribution tonight, because he appears to understand less and less about public transport the more he speaks about it.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): That makes two of you.

Mr. Snape: I am delighted to welcome the Secretary of State to his place. What he says might be true, but I should not be so rude about him because he well knows the affection with which I hold his performance at the Dispatch Box. I notice that he sent his Minister of State to do the dirty work this evening. It will probably embarrass her if I say that she did the job better than he could have done it. Her role in the Department of Transport is to go round the country tapping her head significantly when asked about the Secretary of State's plans.

The hon. Member for Gainsborough talked about how essential expenditure on road works was. He talked about its value in terms of employment. He was right. Substantial employment is involved in road works. He obviously fails to understand what the Conservative party fails to understand — that there is a great deal of employment involved not only in the operation of public transport but in the production of public transport vehicles, such as the building of new buses.

I have to tell the hon. Lady, in her role of purveyor of excuses for the Secretary of State, that the bus industry is not exactly—to use a footballing phrase—over the moon about the Government's proposals——

Mrs. Chalker: That is a romantic phrase.

Mr. Snape: It is a bit late for romance for me. However, if the hon. Lady can tear herself away from the Adjournment debate, she never knows.

It is not good enough for the hon. Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle and others to ignore the fact that many private firms despair because of the Government's attitude towards the public transport industry. Does not the hon. Gentleman stop to consider that firms such as Leyland and Metro Cammell have enormous concern about the employment prejudiced by the barmy proposals of the Government? The public transport industry is surely not only about building roads.

The key to the legislation before us is that the Government are determined to prevent local authorities from making decisions about how money should be spent. They believe that Whitehall knows best. I understand that sort of attitude from the Secretary of State—he had a deprived upbringing. He went to a school where pupils were told from an early age that they knew best. The hon. Lady was not exactly a product of the state system either. The right hon. Gentleman believes that he is entitled to make decisions that will apply throughout the country. It is not only Labour members of local authorities who express concern about the Government's direction on transport policy. A great many members of the Tory party disagree with the legislation. Not too many of them are behind the right hon. Gentleman, which I understand, as many of the young Turks of the Conservative party found themselves, to their amazement, in the House in 1983. At least they can honestly claim that ignorance is bliss. The right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Lady have no such excuse.

I wish to refer——

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Where are the SDP members?

Mr. Snape: We must not expect the SDP members to be around at this time of night—it is far to late for them to be out and about. They have all caught the bus home, presuming that the buses still exist.

I refer to the newspaper report——

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): What is the beef?

Mr. Snape: Does the hon. Gentleman really want to provoke me into that sort of argument?

I refer to the report in The Standard today. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich said that she would not name the newspaper. I do not understand that. I make no bones about my attitude towards it—it is the worst newspaper in this country. It dropped below its usual depths today. Under the headline "Thank you Comrades!" it attempts to mislead — perhaps this was done inadvertently—many Londoners. It refers to "Left-wing Labour politicians" having been sacked from the London Transport Board and says that London ratepayers will be faced with a heavy bill.

The Prime Minister referred to the report and a later edition of the same dreadful newspaper reported that "Maggie"—of course, I would not refer to the Prime Minister in that way, I merely quote from The Standard —considered that the payments to the three who have been sacked were another reason to scrap the GLC. We all know that the Conservative party and Conservative Members hang on every word that the Prime Minister says—well, some of them do so with more enthusiasm than others. The blame for £90,000 being paid out in what are described as "golden handshakes" rests with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. Leigh: No—with Ken Livingstone.

Mr. Snape: That shows how much attention the hon. Gentleman was paying to the debate that took place when the London Regional Transport Bill, as it then was, was being considered in Committee. He should be aware that the Bill as drafted originally provided that compensation for such sackings or redundancies, call them what we will, should be met by the Greater London council.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman knows that he is wrong.

Mr. Snape: No, I am not wrong. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene, I shall gladly allow him to do so. Apparently he does not wish to intervene. The story about the sackings appears in The Standard in a slanted form because the right hon. Gentleman, with his customary incompetence—well, perhaps he was swayed by the persuasive powers of my hon. Friends and myself —accepted an Opposition amendment in Committee that made the Department of Transport responsible for agreeing the terms of compensation if any members of the then board were fired by the Secretary of State. That is what happened, and if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to disagree with my version of events, I shall gladly allow him to intervene.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman is not talking about the order, but he should get other matters straight. The original draft of the then Bill provided that the GLC, among others, could be asked to pay compensatory payments. The Government responded to the hon. Gentleman's amendment by removing that provision. That left the possibility — it was always there — that LRT should pay. The hon. Gentleman is exuberant tonight, but he should get these matters straight.

Mr. Snape: I have never been one to rub it in, and I shall not rub anything into the right hon. Gentleman's intervention. I think that he has conceded my argument, despite his initial indignation. He has accepted, in effect, that it is entirely his fault — this is the effect of his arbitrary decision to remove three members from the board — that taxpayers, and eventually London ratepayers, will have to foot the bill. As I understand the legislation, LRT will have to compensate the Department of Transport.

Mr. Ridley: Wrong again.

Mr. Snape: It is reported in The Standard that ultimately LRT will have to pay the compensation from its own funds, and that the amount will be decided by the Secretary of State for Transport. The right hon. Gentleman's incompetence is there for all to see.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) rose——

Mr. Snape: No, I shall not give way. If the hon. Gentleman turned up more regularly to transport debates I might consider allowing him to intervene. The right hon. Gentleman has condemned himself from his own mouth. He has arranged for the compensation to be paid, and if it is another reason to scrap the GLC, as "Maggie" says, it is an even better reason to scrap the right hon. Gentleman, who is obviously unaware of the effects of his legislation, including the amendment that he accepted.

Once more we are seeing an attempt to undermine the principles of local government democracy. We are told that these decisions are rightly to be taken by central Government. What sort of Conservative party do we have these days when it believes that the bowler hats in Whitehall know the best way to spend local government funds?

I said earlier that I felt that some Conservative Members were motivated only by ignorance. The Government have no such excuse. They are motivated by malice. That is why we shall vote against the order.

12 midnight

Mrs. Chalker: With the leave of the House, I seek to reply to the debate.

The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) is his highly amusing self. Not much of what he said had the least bit to do with the order, but we have come to expect that from him. He said that he was over the moon, or something. I should rather say that he was still in orbit and has not yet been rescued by the new transport satellite, the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). I can only conclude that he had little to say about the order. I think that I know why, because I have, as is customary at this stage of the year, been around many of the roads annual consultative councils. I know that the shire and metropolitan county councils wish to get their bypasses and roads built. The TSG settlement will be roads capital only to assist them to do that, subject to the agreement of the House tonight and the agreement of another place.

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) that the settlement will be based on the transport policies and programmes submitted by the county councils this summer. They decide their priorities, what they put forward in their programme and when they are ready to proceed. Provided that the programme meets with the criteria that we have laid down, which go far wider than the primary road network, they will receive the settlement. I assure the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) that if they are suitable for roads capital only TSG, within sensible limits his bypasses will get it just as much as those of anyone else.

Mr. Snape: Will get what?

Mrs. Chalker: Transport supplementary grant. I realise that the hon. Gentleman does not understand the system and I was trying to help him.

The capital allocations will also provide for additional expenditure over and above that supported by grant. Despite the comments and questions of some hon. Members, I cannot anticipate the settlement that will be announced in December by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, but provided that the order is given the support of the House tonight we shall be able to proceed to a much more sensible and less variable TSG than has been possible in previous years.

Mr. Tony Banks: Much smaller as well.

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman is not right, but I shall come to him in a few moments if I have the time.

A couple of hon. Members have said that the change has been rushed through. Although formal consultation began at the beginning of July, local authority associations have been aware of the likely changes for some time. Capital only TSG has been around for some two years, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport had a good discussion at the national advisory council meeting with local authority representatives in May this year.

[Mrs. Chalker]

As I said a few moments ago, in that discussion the shire and metropolitan county councils said that they wished to get on with their road building, and they want a sensible scheme.

I am well aware that the metropolitan county councils do not wish to lose the excessive revenue support that they have been spending on public transport, but this TSG designed to promote the proper provision of local roads by county councils must be brought forward in this way now if we are to avoid what would otherwise be an unreal settlement in the future.

I accept that the mechanics of the TSG system have been difficult to understand. That is why when the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich commented about the change in the grant rate she ignored the difficulty of the threshold system based on population which has often made it difficult for hon. Members to understand why their bypasses in a sparsely populated county did not receive grant in the same way as they saw bypasses in more heavily populated areas receiving TSG. Those mechanics are simplified considerably by the proposal in the order. This is not a move to curb spending. We are removing the distortions that exist in current spending by using grant for the taxpayers' share of the costs of roads—those roads with more than local benefit. The amount of transport supplementary grant will differ from the previous amount, but the RSG block grant will be larger than it otherwise would have been to take account of road maintenance and other responsibilities.

The hon. Members for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) mentioned parking and other schemes. Since the system in Wales changed, only capital schemes in excess of £5 million have attracted grant. There is, therefore, effectively no change in Wales because of the order.

A number of hon. Members commented on the support for public transport. I have been surprised by the volume of support from the Opposition for the present system and their dire warnings about the new system. That only confirms my view that the current form of TSG is seen by Labour authorities as a means of financing excessive public transport subsidies. Unlike the Opposition, I do not believe that excessive subsidies mean healthy public transport or that they should be underwritten by the taxpayer. The discipline of financing public transport subsidies on an equal footing with other claims on the general resources available to councils will be beneficial to them. The councils may compare the value of the money provided by subsidies with the other means of keeping fares down, such as improvements in efficiency, competitive tendering to the private sector and the like. The Government are no longer prepared to support excessive subsidy for local public transport from central funds. The Government can no longer justify the payment of special central government grant to what are essentially local trading services.

I was asked about revenue for buses and rail services. In removing revenue support from TSG, we are not cutting the resources available to local authorities, as the Opposition have been suggesting. We shall maintain in real terms the provision for local authority current expenditure on transport at the planned 1984-85 level. This provides a sensible level of revenue support for bus services, which we shall continue to support through block grant. We shall be introducing a new GRE formula to reflect the need of authorities to spend on bus subsidies.

We already have a separate GRE indicator for revenue subsidies for local rail services in the passenger transport executive areas. Councils will be able to decide whether to maintain that support for local services within the resources available to them. It is up to them to decide their priorities in the provision of local services. The TSG will not be paid for them, but they will be receiving block grant. [Interruption.] As is to be expected, the Opposition are making a lot of noise in this debate.

An examination of what has happened in recent years — shire counties had just 38 per cent. of the grant available with more than 61 per cent. of the population while London and the metropolitan counties had 62 per cent. of the grant—shows why there has been so much disquiet about TSG and why demand has arisen for a more equitable system. We shall ensure that road maintenance will not suffer. The provision will continue to be steadily increased in real terms, and RSG will reflect that in full, according to the GRE formula contained in RSG for it.

I was also asked about why the changes are coming forward now. They would have come forward even if the abolition of the metropolitan counties and the Greater London council had not been envisaged. They facilitate the payment of the transport supplementary grant to metropolitan districts and London boroughs, as set out in the consultation papers. The metropolitan districts and the London boroughs will get the TSG. They will also receive the block grant for the financing costs of the capital. With the support from RSG and TSG, they will be able to continue contracts inherited and carry out necessary programmes. If anything is different, the proposed changes mean a fairer deal for the metropolitan areas over the abolition period with regard to their road programmes.

I promised to return to the matter raised by the hon. Member for Isle of Wight. I understand it, having toured round the island on a delightful weekend in the summer, when I met him and discussed with his county councillors the problems that they face. He and his county council may rely on the assurance that we have given that we shall continue to support schemes to which we are already committed, for example the new Yar bridge. For the future, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that I am well aware of the special circumstances of several of the roads on the island. The terms of the order are sufficiently widely drawn to allow us to take the circumstances particular to the island into account when drawing up TSG for the future.

The local authorities will still continue to put their transport policies and programmes to the Department. They will decide the priority of their road spending. They will decide the way in which they wish to order their different schemes. That is certainly in no way a central decision about their programmes. They will also be able, as the new system develops, to consider schemes such as the regeneration of certain areas, which will have a national benefit. They can put forward many ideas, which I am sure we shall be able to accept in future.

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business).

Resolved,

That the Local Government (Supplementary Grants for Transport Purposes Specified Descriptions) Order 1984, dated 18th October 1984, a copy of which was laid before this House on 22nd October, in the last Session of Parliament, be approved.

Blind Persons (Benefits)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

12.24 am

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): At the outset of this important debate, may I say how pleased I am that the Minister for Social Security is to reply. I have known him for some years and know that he shares some of the concern that is felt in all parts of the House about the arrangements for the disabled. Tonight we are discussing those who are disabled by blindness. I have some sympathy for the hon. Gentleman, as I believe that his heart would like to make appointments that the Chancellor will not permit him to keep.

I must make some comparisons. Comparisons are always odious, but I should make it clear that, when they compare what happens to people with other forms of disability, the blind are not trying to make divisions between themselves, paraplegics, the mentally handicapped or those who are handicapped by deafness. There is unity and solidarity among the disabled. Although the blind would like their needs to be given special consideration, they do not want that to be at the expense of other sections of the community. Those other sections of the community have been fortunate in regard to mobility and attendance allowances, and the blind are most grateful for that.

I am pleased to see that my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) is present. Everyone knows that, although all Governments have been able to contribute, no Back Bencher has made a greater contribution than did my right hon. Friend by introducing and getting onto the statute book the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970, which started a series of measures providing care and attention. The House is most grateful to him.

I intend to conclude my speech earlier than usual, as the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) is present. As this is an all-party concern, I hope that he might catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, before the Minister replies. Blind people miss out in two ways—first, because most benefits are not geared to help with extra costs. For example, invalidity benefit helps people who have lost their income because they cannot work. It is not designed to meet the extra price of being blind. Secondly, blind people do not qualify for important benefits which would help with extra costs. For example, they do not qualify in their own right for mobility or attendance allowances. Blindness does not qualify people for mobility allowance, which is based on physical ability to move and not on sensory difficulties which make it hard or unsafe to get about and which impose extra costs in assistance and fares. Indeed, many blind people are barred automatically from mobility allowance because they cannot claim it for the first time if they are over 65—and more than half of the 130,000 blind people in the United Kingdom are over 75 and most lost their sight as they grew older. Blindness does not therefore qualify people for attendance and other allowances. In that context, I hope that the Minister will cast his eye over the possibility of making some improvements.

Blind people do not find it easy to do their own decorating, to clean their own windows, to cut their own hedge, to make their own clothes, to mend a fuse or rewire a plug or to shop around for the best value. Blind people find that their clothes get extra wear and tear from bumping into things, rubbing against walls, catching on projections, scorching, cigarette burns and tears. Their crockery and glass is more readily broken and chipped. They often need to pay for a companion and to take taxis when they travel. If one is blind, one often needs tape recorders and tapes to keep telephone numbers, recipes and notes, and to keep up with the printed word. One cannot get by with a ballpoint pen and a pad of paper. One needs a typewriter or a braille typewriting machine. A blind person uses the telephone more and at more expensive times. One needs extra space to store bulky braille books. Braille takes eight times the space of print.

Blind people receive special help, and the Minister will take that into consideration. Forty thousand blind people get supplementary benefit and an extra £1·25 a week. That was fixed in 1962, and I hope that it will be revised. Thirty thousand blind workers receive extra tax relief that amounts to only £2 a week. But 60,000 blind people receive neither. There is, quite rightly, an allowance for those who cannot walk, but there is no allowance for those who cannot see.

Last session an early-day motion sought to persuade the Government to accept International Labour Organisation convention 159, which affects all disabled people, including blind people. It was approved by the ILO, but the Government have still to ratify it.

Blind people face problems at work. I mentioned their difficulty of remaining in the community. For the past 30 years the general principle has been not to put the disabled into institutions, but to make them a living part of the community. That means working. Blind people are at a disadvantage compared with other disabled people regarding sheltered work shops. Because blind people are provided for in an earlier Act than other disabled people, they cannot return to a sheltered work shop after leaving it.

In a period of prosperity blind people leave sheltered work shops and find jobs in the community. When there is a recession, however, they find themselves out of work —at present more than two and a half times as many blind people are unemployed as non-disabled people— and are not permitted to return to sheltered work shops. An attempt should be made to provide such a facility for the blind to bring them into line with other disabled people.

We are a civilised society. A civilised society is judged by the way it treats the very young, the very old and those who are not fortunate enough to have all their faculties and to be able to face the physical and mental problems of our modern world. A civilised society should pay more attention to the fact that for about 25 years the blind have been missing out on provisions. Something should be done to bring provisions for them into line with others who unfortunately suffer from disablement.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): I understand that the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) has the agreement of the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) and the Minister for Social Security to intervene.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): I am greatful to the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) for his characteristic courtesy in allowing me to intervene in the debate. He made an eloquent case for the plight of the blind. I shall confine my contribution to some questions which may enable us to judge more clearly the present position of the blind.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security was good enough to reply to a written question today in which I asked what the present day value was of the original blindness allowance set in 1948 at 15s, or 75p, a week. My hon. Friend replied that its value today would be £7.06. How does he reconcile that with Lord Glenarthur's reply on 21 March this year in another place that "If the extra allowance of 1948 had been increased in line with the movement in the retail price index it would have been £8.21 in November 1983."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 21 March 1984; Vol. 449, c. 1359.]

I appreciate that the Government have made great strides in reducing inflation, but the disparity still seems rather odd. My hon. Friend may say that his answer allowed for the deduction of the housing cost component. If so, perhaps he will assist in restoring comparability as between the two answers.

The hon. Member for Brent, South gave a detailed catalogue of the extra costs incurred by the blind. I believe that the £1.25 currently paid barely meets the cost of maintaining a guide dog. The payment is thus in urgent need of review, especially as it has come nowhere near keeping pace with inflation. Although we applaud the increase in tax allowance given to the blind by the Government some time ago, does not my hon. Friend feel in retrospect that we might have done better to use that money to increase the allowances of the less well off rather than to help the small and relatively more affluent percentage of blind people in a position to pay tax?

I hope that my hon. Friend will also explain one or two anomalies relating to supplementary benefit. It seems that the non-householder addition will make single non-householders better off than single householders. The ordinary rate for single householders is £28.05 per week whereas single non-householders receive £31.15 per week when the supplementary benefit and the blindness addition are added together. Similarly, the long-term rate for single householders is £35.35 per week whereas for single non-householders it is £38.45. That appears to discriminate against the non-householder when it seems clear that the needs of the householder are likely to be greater.

In conclusion, I draw attention to my early-day motion 36 and hope that my hon. Friend the Minister has had the opportunity to study it.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): This debate is of considerable interest to many thousands of people outside the House, some hundreds of whom lobbied Members on the subject earlier today.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) on raising the subject and on the serious and responsible way in which they have put the case, which was very much in line with the impressive way in which the arguments were put to me this afternoon by representatives of the Royal National Institute for the Blind, the National League of the Blind and Disabled and the National Federation of the Blind of the United Kingdom in connection with their lobby. It was put to me fairly firmly this afternoon by one of the people who was in the delegation that what was wanted was not expressions of sympathy but action. I understand that.

[Mr. Tony Newton]

I must make it clear that I cannot tell hon. Members tonight what they want to hear. However, I am sure that there is nothing between us in recognising the problems that blind people face, in our sympathy—I use the word advisedly—with their difficulties, and in our concern to secure that their needs are reflected in the formation of social security policy.

The existing major provisions in supplementary benefit and tax have already been referred to. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West is right in his assumption about the difference between the figure that I gave him in a recent answer about the real value of supplementary benefit addition compared with 1948 and the answer given earlier in the year in another place. It is because, as in all our answers on supplementary benefit rates, of which the blindness addition is one, we use the same price index as that used for uprating supplementary benefit, that is the retail price index less the housing component of that index. The comparable figure to the answer in the other place, had the recent answer been on that basis, would have been of the order of £8·50.

I hope that I made it clear in the answer that I was answering on the basis that I did. That seems sensible, given that for supplementary benefit claimants housing benefit costs are met separately, and that is as true for blind claimants for supplementary benefit as it is for any other. Therefore, it is sensible to use this index convention in talking about supplementary benefit rates or additions. I should not want to mislead my hon. Friend.

There has been reference to the supplementary benefit blind addition and to the tax allowance, which, as my hon. Friend said, has been increased by the Government to £360. However, it may be sensible if I set out in a little more detail some of the other existing provisions, because they amount to somewhat more than is recognised, and it is important that the possible entitlement of blind people should be understood. We have been taking various steps to try to ensure that it is more widely understood.

In addition to the supplementary benefit blind addition of £1·25, as my hon. Friend recognised, single householders aged 18 or over and those aged 16 to 17 who have a dependent child are entitled to a further addition to that benefit to bring the scale rate up to the higher level of a householder. That will be worth, from 26 November, £5·60 additional to those in receipt of the ordinary rate of supplementary benefit and £7·15 extra a week for those on the long-term rate, which includes pensioners. My hon. Friend seems to have misunderstood the position as between householders and non-householders. He will have gathered from what I have just said that the benefit of non-householders is brought up to that for householders in these circumstances.

Equally, where householders are in receipt of both supplementary benefit and housing benefit, where there is a dependant in the household—this is another advantage of the present system for the blind — no assumed contribution towards housing cost is deducted from the claimants' housing or supplementary benefit entitlement. In the case of housing benefit entitlement, where the claimant is in receipt of housing benefit only, the needs allowance is increased by £4·95 a week where the claimant or his partner is blind, and by £7·30 a week if both are blind. That does not mean an equivalent amount of benefit, because that will depend on various other circumstances, including the rent and rates paid, but it brings an additional advantage to blind people. The claimant's benefit is not reduced to take account of an assumed contribution towards housing costs from any non-dependent member of the household.

In the context of the debate, it is perhaps ironic that the provisions mean that, far from being ignored in the present system, blind people are, I think that I am right in saying, the only group of people who command special treatment of this kind as a result of a specific disability. In making that point, I am conscious that it can be turned round to say that the special case for the treatment of blindness in that way has already been recognised. Before hon. Members jump in to make too much of that point, let me say that for the most part those provisions are an inheritance from a time when blindness was virtually the only disability to be recognised. For a long time now—I recognise that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) played an important part in this—the approach of successive Governments of both parties has been to seek to recognise and to try to meet the needs of disabled people as a whole.

The principal reason why the supplementary benefit addition has not been systematically uprated, despite the introduction of new benefits and a massive increase in social security spending on the long-term sick and disabled, is precisely because Governments have sought to concentrate resources on provisions that help disabled people across the board.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): We cannot argue the case for legislation in an Adjournment debate, but the Minister is well aware that the RNIB, the National League of Blind and Disabled and the National Federation of the Blind are concerned to see the introduction of a blindness allowance. Will he be making representations to the Chancellor about the strength of the case for such an allowance? At the same time, can he say anything about the importance of the claim on behalf of people who are both deaf and blind for some help with their mobility? He knows that the Deaf-Blind Helpers League is concerned on that matter. I hope that he will be able to say a brief word about its case.

Mr. Newton: Indeed, I was about to make the point, in the context of what I have just said, about the development of benefits in recent years alongside the long-standing national insurance benefit, sickness benefit, invalidity benefit — sickness benefit partly replaced by statutory sick pay — for those who are incapable of work. We have seen from the right hon. Gentleman's work, and more recently from changes that we have made, the development on non-contributory invalidity benefits, now turning into the severe disablement allowance in which the position of the blind is particularly recognised by automatically passporting them over the 80 per cent. test. There is a range of non-contributory invalidity benefits from which many blind people have benefited. The introduction of attendance allowance has been another major development, and there has been the introduction of mobility allowance.

All those benefits are available to blind people on the same basis as to everybody else. Those are not idle words. I accept that there have been—this is directly relevant to the right hon. Gentleman's point — a number of difficulties about mobility allowance, particularly involving blind and deaf-blind people, and to some extent mentally handicapped people as well, which remain in a state of some uncertainty because of a case which is now going on appeal to the House of Lords. The right hon. Gentleman will understand that, because the matter is subject to appeal, there is little that I can add tonight except to say that we shall review the need to look at the guidance, and, indeed, if necessary, the regulations in the light of the outcome of that case. Clearly I cannot say more than that tonight.

On our latest information, some 13,600 people with visual impairment are in receipt of attendance allowance. It must be bringing them considerable assistance.

Mr. Butterfill: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is probable that the vast majority of those are elderly blind people who might well receive attendance allowance in any case?

Mr. Newton: It is possible, although we cannot be sure, because we do not have sufficient analyses. However, I shall come to that point in a moment. As time is short, I simply want to emphasise that as a Government we have sought to build on the approach of developing benefits that spread across the range of disabled people and are directed primarily to the needs that arise from disability, rather than to classify people according to their disabilities.

To that end, we have commissioned the most substantial survey of disabled people and their needs to have been undertaken in this country for many years, with a view to giving us better information for future planning and policy making. It would, of course, be open to hon. Members to say that they wished to change the approach that has informed the development of disability benefits in recent years under Governments of both parties, but I hope that they will ask themselves a few questions before deciding that that is what they wish to do. For example, is such an approach really consistent with the more coherent system of benefits for disabled people which is, I think, our common aim, given that the effects of so many disabilities and disabling diseases vary so much from case to case? Is it established that the undoubted problems that blind people face can be so clearly distinguished from those caused by other disabilities that the case of a blindness allowance can be taken in isolation?

The hon. Member for Brent, South has always, to his great credit, taken a close interest in the problems of deaf people and he will be as well aware as I am of the case put forward by them and on their behalf in respect of the extra costs of their special problems. Indeed, that case is being advanced at the moment. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman would wish any more than I do to arbitrate between the claims of the blind and the deaf, but I am sure that I will carry him with me in saying that the organisations representing the deaf feel that they too have a powerful case which should command our attention.

Given that three quarters of those who are blind are over 65 and that well over half are over 75—in other words, that blindness is predominantly a problem of old age—are hon. Members really sure that it would be right to single out blindness for unique provision alongside the many other disadvantages and disabilities of advancing years?

In asking those questions, I have deliberately refrained from referring to the question of cost, but clearly that too has to be faced. To extend the blindness allowance to all blind people at mobility allowance rates would cost about £125 million. Even more modest proposals, such as the maintenance of age restrictions for mobility allowance and their application to a blindness allowance, would probably leave us with a bill of about £40 million. Inescapably, those figures must be looked at alongside many other claims including an extension of invalid care allowance to married women, a reduction of the 80 per cent. disability test for the severe disablement allowance, the possible introduction of a partial incapacity benefit, and abolition of the mobility allowance age limit. They are all powerful claims. There are also demands for an improvement in services, such as the employment services to which the hon. Member for Brent, South referred, if resources are available.

I do not know, and I do not pretend to know, the answers to all the questions that I have put before the House. I have tried to approach the debate in a spirit of listening constructively to the arguments at a time when we are looking at much of our existing provision for social security and mounting a major survey of needs, including the information necessary for future planning.

I am sorry that I have been unable to say what hon. Members would like me to say, but they can be assured that in our work we shall be determined to ensure that we take account—as we should—of the case that has been made here tonight on behalf of blind people.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at seven minutes to One o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Falkland Islands

1. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response has been made by Her Majesty's Government to the most recent United Nations resolution on the subject of the Falkland Islands.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Renton): We voted against this resolution. It is not mandatory. We are not prepared to enter into negotiations on sovereignty over the Falkland Islands, but we remain ready to re-build confidence with Argentina by means of a dialogue on practical ways of improving bilateral relations.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Minister agree that the case of the British Government—and, indeed, of the British people—would be a good deal stronger if social and economic conditions in the islands were nearer the norms of 1984 than those of 1784? Is it not a fact that the principal proprietor and factor in the Falkland Islands is one company, whose profits go to absentee shareholders? Is it not also a fact that Lord Shackleton some years ago reported that the land should be made available to the Falkland Islanders? Why are the Government not pursuing that aim more vigorously?

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman's references to the distinctions between 1784 and 1984 are rather obscure. There has been press speculation about the private contracts which the Falkland Islands Company entered into with individuals. Those contracts were all entered into freely, without coercion. There is no evidence that would lead us to suppose—and we have checked with the Civil Commissioner — that any degree of coercion was involved in the agreement of those contracts. We are satisfied that under the auspices of the Falkland Islands Development Corporation there will be a gradual approach —as Lord Shackleton recommended—to the question of land subdivision and redistribution. That will take time, but steps are being taken.

Sir Anthony Beaumont-Dark: Is my hon. Friend aware that I recently returned from a visit to the Falkland Islands? There is no doubt that the people there are 150 per cent. British and that for us to talk about sovereignty at present could mean only that distance and expense had weakened resolve and honour. Although we can talk to the Argentines about many things, including minerals and oil, does my hon. Friend agree that we cannot now or in years to come sell British people unless they wish to live under a different regime, and there is no doubt that the Falkland Islanders do not wish to do so?

Mr. Renton: I am aware that my hon. Friend and other hon. Members have recently visited the Falkland Islands, and I hope that they all had a most instructive time there. Much of what my hon. Friend said, I endorse. We believe that the Argentines will realise that sovereignty is not for negotiation and that, putting that aside, they will themselves search for means by which we can talk about how to improve relations between our two countries on a bilateral basis.

Mr. Heffer: I shall set aside the question whether it was right or wrong to go to war with Argentina—an action which I personally supported at that time. However, now that — as a result of the war — there is a democratically elected Government in Argentina, should we not seriously discuss the future of the Falkland Islands with that Government? Is the Minister aware that, with our finances, we should not pretend that we can sustain the islands for ever, when they are bound to become a bigger and bigger white elephant and supporting them will not serve any purpose for the future of this country?

Mr. Renton: Like the hon. Gentleman, we welcomed the restoration of democracy in Argentina. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister welcomed it in a message to President Alfonsin last December, and our ambassador to the United Nations made strong reference to it in his speech in the Falklands debate. Although the hon. Gentleman talks in those terms, has he thought about the rights of the Falkland Islanders to self-determination? In our wish to begin talking to Argentina about progress to more normal bilateral relations, it would be sensible for Argentina to realise that the transfer of sovereignty, which is what Argentina means by talking about sovereignty, is not on.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Does my hon. Friend appreciate that President Alfonsin was completely opposed to the invasion of the Falkland Islands and should, therefore, be supported on that account? Was it not wrong for one organ of Government—not the Foreign Office—actively to discourage Conservative Members of the European Parliament from meeting President Alfonsin on his recent visit to the European Parliament? Is that not completely contradictory to what the Conservative party stands for, and more like the behaviour of a squalid Socialist Council?

Mr. Renton: We believed that the European Parliament's invitation to President Alfonsin was inappropriate — [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] I said "inappropriate", bearing in mind the fact that one member of the European Community—Britain—does not have diplomatic relations with Argentina and that Argentina has not yet agreed to a formal cessation of hostilities with Britain. In those circumstances, my use of the word "inappropriate" is perfectly fair and reasonable.

Mr. George Robertson: What is inappropriate about the European Parliament inviting the newly elected President of a republic to address it—a President who kicked out the junta who invaded the Falkland Islands—and allowing Conservative Members of the European Parliament, who have also been elected, to listen respectfully to someone who has a mandate? As someone who has just returned from Argentina, I assure the Minister that the newly elected Government have a genuine, deeply felt desire to achieve a settlement that will be in the interests of Britain, Argentina and, crucially, of the Falkland Islanders. Should we not expect from the Government a reasonable response to such a conciliatory feeling before it becomes impossible to sustain such conciliatory feelings in that country?

Mr. Renton: I welcome the hon. Gentleman back from his trip to Argentina, which I am sure he found useful. I must stress that on many occasions during the past 12 months we have sought opportunities for the sort of talks with Argentina that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. The formula that led to the Berne talks was arrived at after months of negotiations, and following an initial message from Britain. We did not break the formula that had been agreed for Berne; the Argentines broke it by their insistence on talking about sovereignty. We hope that, putting sovereignty on one side, we will be able to talk with the Argentines about a range of options that will lead to normal bilateral relations between our countries.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. In fairness to those hon. Members who have questions later on the Order Paper, I ask for briefer questions.

Ethiopia

4. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to pay an official visit to Ethiopia.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present to visit Ethiopia, but my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development hopes to go out later this month to look at relief operations.

Mr. Home Robertson: One hopes that this relief operation will be making headway. As the Foreign Secretary will eventually have to carry the can for the cuts in the real value of the foreign aid budget announced by the Chancellor earlier this week, is the Minister prepared to give the House a clear, categorical undertaking that the aid programme for Ethiopia and other famine-hit areas will be expanded in line with the clearly expressed demand of the nation?

Mr. Rifkind: It has already been made clear to the House that any recent decisions involving public expenditure will not affect humanitarian aid to Ethiopia.

Mr. Baldry: Would it not be better for my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to go to Brussels, rather than Ethiopia, and take a firm lead in the Council of Ministers to persuade the other nations of the Community that, at a time when our granaries are groaning with grain, it should cut through the budgetary red tape and ensure that sufficient supplies reach drought-affected Africa?

Mr. Rifkind: I am aware that my hon. Friend has returned from a trip to Ethiopia, during which he saw many horrors, and his views are listened to with great care and attention. The British Government, in the person of the Prime Minister, have already taken an initiative within the Community, and, thanks to that initiative, since October the Community has already agreed on £35 million-worth of food aid to go to that country.

Mr. Kirkwood: The monetary figures being bandied about as being the prospective cuts in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office budget for next year are similar to the figures that would provide the 600,000 to 750,000 tonnes of grain required for basic feeding over the next 12 months. Will the Minister bear that in mind when he, or his right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development, visits Ethiopia?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman, and the House as a whole, will appreciate that such is the scale of the problem faced by Ethiopia that it is necessary to pursue an international response. Britain has shown a willingness to make substantial contributions, and we have taken the initiative in multilateral and international organisations. It is through international co-operation that the greatest impact can be made.

Mr. John Townend: Will my hon. Friend ask our right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development, when he visits Ethiopia, to point out to that Government that if they spent on food the vast amounts of money that they spent on celebrating the Marxist revolution and buying arms from Russia fewer people would be starving? At a critical time such as this is it not appalling for the United Nations to be proposing to spend £15 million on building a conference centre in Ethiopia?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. A country that finds it impossible to provide basic food requirements for its population should think carefully before using its resources on what many would consider to be less essential matters.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Having assured the House that there will be no cut in the short-term food aid, will the Minister assure the House that there will be no cuts in long-term aid? He will recall that most people in the world said, after the appalling famine in Ethiopia in 1972-73, that it should never be allowed to happen again. Is it not true that unless we give such countries long-term aid during the next few years we shall face further crises? Is it not as important for us to give them long-term aid as it is for us to give them immediate emergency food aid?

Mr. Rifkind: I accept that the long-term problems of Ethiopia require more than just emergency food aid. The hon. Gentleman, who has just returned from that country, will agree that the immediate problem on which the international community should concentrate is that of the many thousands who face imminent starvation unless there is an adequate international response.

Mr. Bowen Wells: Is it not a matter for congratulating the Government that they have provided emergency relief and food aid to Ethiopia, not just in the past few months, but over at least two years before that? Under the definition of continuing humanitarian aid to Ethiopia, will my hon. Friend be able to sustain development designed to offset the effects of drought in Ethiopia and other countries if the budget of the Foreign Office is not compensated for exchange rate changes and inflation rate rises overseas?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is right when he says that British aid to Ethiopia began not just in the past two months. In the past two years no less than £13 million worth of food has been given directly by the United Kingdom to help overcome the problems of starvation in Ethiopia.

As for the longer term, I am sure that my hon. Friend will accept that it will be for my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development to look at the competing claims of Ethiopia and other countries for assistance via our general overseas aid policy.

Mr. Healey: Does the Minister agree, first, that the scale of the human tragedy in Ethiopia is such as to make ignoble and unworthy the sort of political point scoring into which he was tempted a moment ago, and, secondly, that the scale of the exi•ting tragedy in Ethiopia far dwarfs the amount of aid which is being given by Europe and the United States? The famine in other African countries, notably Sudan and Chad, which border Ethiopia, is fast approaching the same scale. Therefore very much more humanitarian aid is needed immediately. If similar disasters are to be avoided in future years, development aid must be vastly increased above the level that Her Majesty's Government have so far found fit to provide.

Mr. Rifkind: I acknowledge at once that when the right hon. Gentleman speaks of political point scoring he does so from a position of great experience.

On the wider issues that he raised, I think he will accept that long-term economic aid for Ethiopia or any other country takes account of considerations which go far beyond the relief of immediate suffering and potential starvation. I am sure he will accept that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development will be applying the usual developmental criteria in deciding how to use the available resources.

Mr. Healey rose——

Mr. Speaker: No. I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman may ask only one supplementary question.

Turkey

5. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on current relations between Her Majesty's Government and Turkey.

Mr. Renton: Turkey is an important and valued NATO ally of the United Kingdom. We welcome the progress towards the return to full democracy made since the elections last November, but look forward to further steps in this direction.

Mr. Parry: Does the Minister not think it ironic that the American Government are making such a fuss over the elections in Nicaragua when we see Turkey, as a member of NATO and of the Council of Europe, still under martial law, repressing human rights and imprisoning trade unionists and peace campaigners? Will the Minister make clear to our Government, to the Turkish Government and to the United States Government the British people's repugnance at such double standards?

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman complains of the slow progress towards democracy in Turkey, but he must recognise that in the local elections this March more parties took part than in the national elections last November and that 33 out of Turkey's 67 provinces will have had martial law lifted by 19 November. I understand and share his concern about human rights and about the trial of the trade unionists to which he referred, but he might like to know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has had four discussions in the past 12 months with the Turkish Foreign Minister, Mr. Halefoglu, at two of which the question of human rights was raised.

Israel

6. Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Israel.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): I visited Israel from 28 to 30 October. I was able to have friendly and open discussions with senior Ministers in the new Israeli Government on international and bilateral issues. I explained to them our support for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon and for early progress towards a settlement of the Arab/Israel dispute. I also had a most useful meeting with Palestinian representatives.

Mr. Temple-Morris: My right hon. and learned Friend is to be congratulated on the way that he handled that visit. Does he agree that now is a very appropriate time for a new and major United States initiative to achieve peace in the middle east? Would not that initiative benefit from the fact that the Israeli response, for better or worse—and it is to be hoped for better—would be the response of a national coalition Government?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree that the Arab-Israel problem cannot and will not be solved simply by being neglected and that time is not on the side of those who argue that. There is a case for seeking once again to move forward the search for a peaceful conclusion of the differences there, and the completion of the American election provides a fresh opportunity for considering that matter actively. Whether the existence of a coalition Government makes it easier or more difficult to see progress is a matter about which I reserve judgment.

Mr. Johnston: Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman discuss with the Israeli Government the absolute necessity of halting Israeli settlements on the West Bank as a precondition for any initiative of the kind suggested by the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) and state that that point was being put strongly to the United States Government?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That was certainly one of the points to which I drew attention. I drew attention to the need to have regard to both principles — respect for Israel's right to a secure existence and respect for the right of the Palestinians to self-determination—if there is to be progress towards a solution. I made it plain that the Israeli settlements were illegal, that their continued existence represented an obstacle to peace and that a freeze on that policy would increase confidence in Israeli intentions.

Mr. Latham: I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his successful visit. Will he take this opportunity to put his weight behind a strengthening of UNIFIL and its redeployment in south Lebanon to help bring about a withdrawal of Israeli armed forces and at the same time to protect Israel's northern frontier and its communities in Galilee?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have long favoured an expansion in the size and mandate of UNIFIL to facilitate the withdrawal of Israeli troops. Indeed, the idea was first put forward by this country in September last year.

Mr. Janner: In view of the improved relations between the United Kingdom and Israel fostered by the Foreign Secretary's visit, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman reaffirm the Government's opposition to the Arab boycott and reconsider the continued authentication of Arab boycott documents, which is so greatly resented by Israel and by those who believe in free trade among democratic countries?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I certainly renew our deploration of all attempts by third parties to restrict trade with Israel and thus of the boycott itself. As the hon. and learned Gentleman knows, just over a year ago we completed a review of the kind that he requests on Foreign and Commonwealth Office authentication. We concluded that it would not be right to change the present position. It is a standard legal procedure and does no more than confirm the validity of the signature. It is true that this causes continuing anxiety in Israel—I heard and took note of it —but I do not wish to encourage the belief that we intend to renew the review.

Mr. Walters: As the illegal Israeli settlements on the occupied West Bank are a major impediment to progress towards peace, what further steps does my right hon. and learned Friend intend to take, possibly with our European partners, to ensure that that major obstacle is removed?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We shall be considering the matter yet again in the European Community in the light of the re-election of President Reagan, but I do not wish to encourage the belief that we shall be launching a new initiative — [Interruption.] I appreciate hon. Members' amusement at that comment, but it is all too easy to generate the hope of some dramatic new breakthrough when what is really needed is sustained application by the European Community, in consultation with the United States, to try to get the parties to move forward along the lines that I have described. I shall certainly seek to promote progress in that direction.

Mr. Concannon: Having been involved in the Palestinian problem for nearly 40 years, since 1945, I thank the Foreign Secretary for his robust statement regarding the Palestinians and for meeting their representatives. Is there any chance of some action to follow those final words?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. In the interests of Israel as much as of the Palestinians the problem cannot be left to fester, as it is likely to get worse rather than better. It is thus important to urge on both sides the need to move towards recognising the principles that I have enunciated and to start the negotiation process. We shall do all that we sensibly can within the European Community and in concert with the United States, but the 40-year duration to which the right hon. Gentleman refers is one reason for approaching the matter with a cautious, though energetic, disposition.

Stockholm Disarmament Conference

7. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest session of the Stockholm disarmament conference.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Richard Luce): In the third session, which began on 11 September and ended on 12 October, the British Government, in close consultation with other Western delegations, continued their efforts to develop a detailed discussion on the practical confidence-building proposals tabled by the West at the outset of the conference. The neutral and non-aligned countries participated in this. To our disappointment the Eastern countries did not appear ready to discuss details either of these measures or of their own vague declaratory proposals. The conference resumed on 6 November.

Mr. Chapman: Will my hon. Friend confirm and stress that it was the United Kingdom Government who put forward specific and attainable proposals, such as the notification of the structure and deployment of military forces and the observation of military exercises, and that it was the Soviet Government who, sadly, not only failed to respond to those specific proposals but indulged in what can only be described as well-worn propagandist platitudes that have done nothing to build up confidence and trust between European nations?

Mr. Luce: I can confirm that it was the United Kingdom Government, in conjunction with our Western allies, who earlier this year put forward practical proposals designed to enhance the exchange of information about the structure and deployment of forces and of the mandatory observation of regular military activities. The purpose of those proposals is to build up trust and to try to reduce misunderstanding and the element of surprise that could arise as a result of potential aggression. So far, we have simply had declaratory measures from the Soviet Union and the Eastern bloc and a total unwillingness to talk about those practical measures. We have the political will; the test is whether they have.

Mr. George Robertson: Does the Minister agree that the re-election of President Reagan at least allows a new opportunity urgently to reopen talks on arms reduction, but that the serious problem will now be to persuade the Soviet Union that the "evil empire" type of rhetoric has ended and that the President and his Administration mean business? Will he take every opportunity in Stockholm and elsewhere to convince our allies of their responsibility to show that we are all interested in reducing tension and arriving at the agreements that are so urgently necessary?

Mr. Luce: I must agree that the re-election of President Reagan gives a renewed opportunity for the Western world and the United States to pursue the question of arms control with the utmost vigour. I believe that the President of the United States wishes to do that and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall continue to work closely with the United States in supporting, for example, its proposals that there should be discussions of arms restraint in outer space and in urging the Soviet Union to be sensible enough to come back to the negotiating table, which must surely be in its interests.

Libya

8. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further statement on the Government's relations with Libya.

Mr. Luce: Four of the hostages detained by the Libyan authorities earlier this year are still being held. We continue to make vigorous representations through the Italian protecting power, and through other channels, to secure their early release. We look to the Libyan authorities to give a fair and open trial to the two who were recently charged with security offences. While British citizens are being held without justification we cannot begin to look at ways of dealing with other problems between us and the Libyan authorities.

Mr. MacKay: Will my hon. Friend go somewhat further and confirm to the House that we will not give in to Libyan blackmail by entertaining at any time a swap of the two British citizens who have been arrested with terrorists held in Britain? At the same time, will he confirm that those British citizens in Libya at the moment are being adequately represented?

Mr. Luce: I must endorse strongly what my hon. Friend has just said. There can be no blackmail whatever as a result of the four citizens who have been detained. If we, as a Government, were to follow the policy of handing over those who have been convicted in British courts of terrorist offences, that would undoubtedly greatly increase the danger to British subjects in many other parts of the world. We cannot conceivably contemplate that.

We are watching the interests of the four citizens with great concern and are taking action with regard to Mr. Russell and Mr. Anderson, against whom we believe that there are now charges, to clarify the nature of those charges, to ensure that they have adequate legal representation and to work hard to ensure that their trial is open, fair and is held as early as possible.

Mr. Ryman: Will the MInister confirm, or deny, that Libyan nationals are being trained in this country by the NCB in the use of computers which could easily be adapted for military purposes?

Mr. Luce: I cannot give a specific answer, but I shall look into the matter. We broke off diplomatic relations with Libya on 22 April 1984 in the light of the terrible incident in which WPC Fletcher was killed. We do not have any official relations with that country, but ordinary trade continues. There are still 4,000 British subjects in Libya and I hope that the House will take note of that.

Departmental Costs

9. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further action he is taking to control the total running costs of his Department.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) said on 27 June, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is continuously seeking to reduce costs. The process is continuing despite the increasing demands on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, which were recognised by the Foreign Affairs Committee in its report on the FCO and ODA Supply Estimates. Measures which are being taken or planned to control running costs include, for example, travel and freight arrangements, office cleaning and secretarial services and computerisation of certain accounting processes in the ODA.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the Government's swift and humane action in Ethiopia will be unaffected by any expenditure review currently in process?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I give my hon. Friend the immediate assurance that in the course of the review of my programmes there will be no reduction whatever in the allocations made for humanitarian aid to poorer countries, including disaster or famine relief of the sort now being given to Ethiopia and elsewhere, and that any effect on the overall aid programme will be modest, and certainly not on the scale suggested in some newspapers. I am taking a very careful look at all the overseas activities apart from aid for which I am responsible, including the British Council, the external services of the BBC, military training and assistance, and diplomatic representation, and I will decide where adjustments can best be made in the national interest.

Dr. Owen: Does the Foreign Secretary accept that many of us believe that there is no case for any cut—even a modest one — in the aid budget? Given the problems of the Diplomatic Service with the movement of currencies, is it not reasonable that that should be met out of the Contingency Reserve? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give an assurance that if he makes savings he will cut back on some of the larger missions and not reduce the number of missions? It is a sign of success that over the past 20 years the Foreign Office has expanded the number of missions by 19 per cent. while having a 20 per cent. cut in the Diplomatic Service. Even single diplomat missions are better than withdrawing from any country.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman understands from his own experience that the programmes of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office have to be managed within the framework of the Government's economic policy as a whole. He is right to draw attention to the scope for savings in the area that he has identified, but the fact that there has been a cut means that the scope for further progress in that direction may be limited. However, I assure him that no possible option will be excluded from my consideration.

Mr. Rippon: Is it not the height of folly that we spend billions of pounds on defence and yet appear to grudge every penny spent on foreign policy? In view of the importance of the issues involved, will my right hon. and learned Friend produce a White Paper setting out the precise nature and purpose of any cuts that he has in mind?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My right hon. and learned Friend must understand that the balancing of all policies—whether on defence, Foreign and Commonwealth representation or on the substantial domestic programmes which are themselves having to face reductions—must be undertaken by arriving at the best balance of judgment. The House will be kept informed of my conclusions in the usual way.

Mr. Healey: Can the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm the estimate of his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym), that the figures announced on Monday by the Chancellor of the Exchequer imply a cut in real terms of between £30 million and £100 million in the expenditure for which the Foreign Secretary is responsible? How can he possibly justify any cut in the aid programme when recent events have proved that it is now desperately urgent to increase it by at least 50 per cent. so that it represents the same proportion of national wealth as under the previous Labour Government?

How can the right hon. and learned Gentleman justify any cut in other instruments of British foreign policy, already cut well beyond the bone in some cases, when the Government are increasing their expenditure on the European Community by £200 million more than planned earlier this year? Does he think that these priorities reflect a rational view of Britain's interests?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The reductions achieved in Britain's contributions as a result of the Fontainebleau negotiations are substantial and amount to about £2½ billion. The Labour Government's arrangements achieved not one penny saving. The right hon. Gentleman must recognise that all Governments have to arrive at a set of decisions which fit alongside each other in the allocation of their programmes. He must remember that when he performed the Chancellor's duties he announced reductions in the aid programme of £50 million in three successive years. That was a reduction on a much more substantial scale and it did not exclude an impact on the poorest people.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

Spain and Portugal

55. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress in negotiations, on the accession of Spain and Portugal to the EEC.

Mr. Rifkind: Negotiations have been substantially completed in 10 of the 17 chapters in the Spanish accession negotiations, and 11 of the 17 chapters in the Portuguese negotiations. Negotiations continue on the outstanding issues, including such difficult problems as agriculture, fisheries and Spanish industrial tariffs, with the aim of resolving them in time for Spain and Portugal to enter the Community on 1 January 1986.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is not the date of accession rapidly receding once again? Will this not be seen as a sign of a lack of enthusiasm and good will on the part of other members of the European Community? Does the Minister agree that it is unfortunate that Portugal and Spain are linked in the accession negotiations, because the Portuguese negotiations could be concluded earlier than the Spanish negotiations?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Lady is right to attach importance to the date of 1 January 1986. We still believe that that date can be adhered to. There has been more progress in the Portuguese negotiations, but even they are not yet complete. It seems sensible therefore, since many of the issues are similar, for the negotiations to go hand in hand.

Mr. Body: As Spain has been building up the largest fishing fleet on the continent of Europe in preparation for entry into the Common Market, will my hon. Friend make plain this afternoon to what extent he can give an assurance to the fishermen of England—the fishermen of this country—that their livelihoods will not be endangered?

Mr. Rifkind: We attach enormous importance to the issues that affect the fisherman of the United Kingdom as a whole. Negotiations involve fisheries, which is one of the most difficult issues to resolve. We have made it clear that the common fisheries policy, which was agreed only after many years of difficult and delicate negotiation, cannot be disrupted as a result of Spanish accession. I believe that the Spanish authorities are realistic enough to realise that any fisheries agreement must take account of the existing interests of member states.

Mr. Johnston: What will the Community be able to do to help Portugal when it joins? It is the poorest country in Europe. Unless there is a significant increase in the Community budget to enable expenditure to take place in Portugal through the regional and social funds, will not all the talk about political good will and democratic stability be seen as empty rhetoric?

Mr. Rifkind: Portugal will be the poorest member of the enlarged Community and cannot be required to be a net contributor, however much the existing arrangements might otherwise point in that direction. Negotiations are still to take place on the own resources chapter and I am sure that all the circumstances will be taken into account.

Mr. Harris: I welcome what my hon. Friend says about the fishing industry and about the threat posed by Spain, but does he accept that there is considerable alarm and hostility over the possiblity that the whole question of fishing will now be pushed off until after Spain's accession? Does he agree that the uncertainty which that will cause will be incredibly damaging, not least to the fishermen of the south-west of England?

Mr. Rifkind: I do not believe that there is any danger of that. The main issues to be resolved during the current negotiations concern the length of the transitional period, transitional arrangements for access to waters and resources and fishery relations with third countries. All interested parties realise that the Community must reach a view in advance of Spain's accession. I am sure that that point will be put to the Spanish Government with great force.

Mr. Foulkes: Is the Minister aware that the Opposition share the Government's concern that Spain and Portugal should be admitted to the Community on schedule? We are also concerned to ensure that the interests of the fishermen of the whole of the United Kingdom are protected. Is the Minister aware that the Opposition share the widespread outrage of the British public at British criminals being able to hide in Spain outwith the jurisdiction of British law? Can the Minister confirm that a condition of Spain's accession will be an agreement on extradition? How far have we progressed towards that?

Mr. Rifkind: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's statement on behalf of the Opposition confirming that they, too, attach importance to Spanish and Portuguese membership of the Community.

Extradition matters do not fall within the negotiations for Spanish membership of the Community.

Joint Policy Commitments

57. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with European Economic Community Government's Foreign Ministers regarding joint policy commitments; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Community Foreign Ministers last met at the regular Foreign Affairs Council on 22 and 23 October. A special Foreign Affairs Council met yesterday to discuss the enlargement of the Community. As usual in the Council, discussions were aimed at reaching agreement on matters of Community policy.

Mr. Skinner: Did the Council discuss the disposal of the food mountains? When the right hon. and learned Gentleman next meets his counterparts, will he tell them that for the past decade or more people in this place—the so-called opinion-formers from the middle classes from both sides of the House, but especially from the Social Democratic and Liberal parties — have always told people that if only Britain was in the Common Market we could look after the starving millions in Africa and elsewhere? What happened to all those dreams? Where are the visionaries now? Are there not literally thousands of young children in Ethiopia, Sudan and elsewhere, with pot bellies and matchstick legs? Is not Latin America up to its neck in debt?

What happened to all those dreams for the Common Market? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman ask the Community to dispose of the food surpluses and feed those hungry mouths rather than send the food elsewhere?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No one should doubt the Government's concern to do everything possible to meet the problems of poverty throughout the world. The hon. Gentleman's perception of almost all the foundations of his question is fatally flawed in thousands of respects. The Community, through co-operation, has been able to generate a substantial increase in food production. It has been able to finance from scratch the Lomé programme of aid to African, Caribbean and Pacific countries, and intends to continue in that direction. It would be a great deal more helpful if the hon. Gentleman would begin to discard some of his offensive and ridiculous illusions.

Mr. Rowe: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that one of the most important joint policy commitments is that to a genuine common market in services? We are encouraged by what he said recently in Bonn about establishing that market. Can he tell us how much further he hopes to go in the near future?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend is right to emphasise the importance of the establishment of a genuine common market in services as well as in goods. We have been laying emphasis on the need to achieve that — for example, for insurance, road haulage and air transport services. We shall continue to press the case in all the Council's dealings with these matters—not least because it is only if we achieve a continental-wide market for services as well as for goods that the Community can make the contribution to reducing unemployment throughout the Community which we all believe it can make.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: How could the Foreign Secretary prevail upon himself on his recent visit to Germany to mislead the credulous and ignorant Germans by assuring them on what he knows well is not the case, namely that there is preponderant enthusiasm in Britain for membership of the EEC?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is because I believe that the cause which the right hon. Gentleman has pursued with such tenacity over the years in the opposite direction is one which is receiving diminishing support.

Mr. Dykes: Will my right hon. and learned Friend pursue energetically with his colleagues the excellent proposals in the Fontainebleau document submitted by the Prime Minister dealing with vital matters of joint working, including majority voting on major decisions and greater political integration?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We attach importance to the Community operating its institutions in such a fashion as to achieve decisions expeditiously, and not have important policy changes of the sort referred to by my hon. Friend impeded by that cause. We do not support any changes in the structure of the treaty on voting procedures, and neither the Fontainebleau nor the Genscher-Colombo agreements envisage any change in that respect.

Mr. Robin Cook: May I return to the original question of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)? Does the Foreign Secretary not recognise that a public who are deeply moved by the plight of those caught in the Ethiopian famine view with bewilderment the fact that the EEC, which has the capacity to eliminate the famine, has done so little so late? Does he accept that the amount of grain so far released by the EEC is barely 1 per cent. of surplus stocks and less than one tenth of the amount which the EEC is currently converting into animal feedstuffs for Europe? Does he understand that it is offensive that the Government should announce this week increased expenditure on the storage of surplus grain brought forth by the common agricultural policy although it is cheaper to ship the surplus grain to Ethopia than to store it in Europe? What will he do to press his colleagues within Europe to respond with more generosity and more humanity before it is too late to respond?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman fails again to perceive the issue as a whole. It is necessary to overcome the Community's capacity to generate surplus food in many directions, at great cost, which cannot be disposed of in any way. That is one of the policies which the Government have been fighting and will continue to fight. It is a difficult one to sustain. There are many inside and outside the House who recognise that the Government have been taking the lead in pressing the Community to expand its aid programme to famine-ridden areas. Since the beginning of October £35 million-worth of aid has been given in that way, substantially as a result of the lead given by the Government.

Common Foreign Policy

59. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress towards a common European Community foreign policy.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Progress is being made within the Community to establish an increasingly strong and effective common position by Community countries on matters where they can sensibly act together on external affairs.

Mr. Knox: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that greater co-operation on foreign policy within the Community remains a principal objective of Government policy?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I certainly will. The increasing use of Community procedures for political co-operation is something to which we attach importance. We believe that there are a number of areas in which we can more effectively act together and we have concerted our policy in that way.

Mr. Ernie Ross: Does the Foreign Secretary agree that one area in which the Community was agreed was that of the Venice declaration? Does he regard it as rather sad that that declaration has not been pursued to a conclusion? Will he take this opportunity to welcome the decision of the Palestine Liberation Organisation to proceed to hold a Palestine national council on 22 November in Amman? Does he recognise that that is an initiative which should be responded to by the European Community partners?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The extent to which the Community was able in the Venice declaration to formulate a common position on the right approach to the Arab-Israel dispute was important. We shall consider at an early opportunity the possibility of making a further contribution to that process.

Mr. Jackson: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, while it is essential that the Community should be able to respond to disasters, it is essential also in disposing of the surpluses to which reference has been made that we should not undermine agricultural development in the Third world?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. One of the wider consequences of the production of surpluses within the Community at the expense of the taxpayer is the risk of doing real damage to countries which should be able to generate more successfully their own programmes for food production, and of doing long-term damage on a much wider scale.

Own Resources

60. Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Foreign Affairs Council has decided on a definite date for the introduction of the new system of increased own resources for EEC member states.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No, Sir.

Mr. Gould: Will the Foreign Secretary give an assurance that, long before the introduction of any increase in own resources, he will make a clear statement to the House that the preconditions he has set for the reform of the CAP and the budget have been met, and that the House will have a full opportunity to debate those issues?

Sir. Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman can be assured that, before any proposal for increased own resources is presented to the House, there will be opportunities for debating it. In considering that matter we shall continue to attach importance to effective implementation of the Fontainebleau-Brussels agreements on the need for budget discipline and continued progress in securing the necessary reforms of the common agricultural policy which were set in hand on 31 March.

Mr. Marlow: Will my right hon. and learned Friend set about scrubbing that aspect of the Fontainebleau agreement to do with the increase in own resources? The Government's justifications for an increase in own resources are the accession of Spain and Portugal, which has been deferred even further into the future, and the reduction in agricultural expenditure, which will not occur. That has been confirmed by the fact that the agricultural levy cannot even be applied properly in France. If my right hon. and learned Friend reads Old Muckraker in "Private Eye", he will discover that we are being done for an extra £100 million a year for selling Common Market surpluses of grain from our country.

Sir. Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend will not be in the least surprised to know that I cannot give him any such assurance. Provided the conditions to which we have repeatedly drawn attention are fulfilled—the House will have a opportunity to consider them—we shall, in due course, bring forward a proposal to increase own resources.

Mr. Loyden: Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the system of food from own resources linked to a common agricultural policy generally is obscene? My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) has said that it rings rather hollow for Conservative Members to talk about the problems of the Third world, which, incidentally, were not discovered in 1984, but which were the inheritance of imperialism and colonialism. It is the height of obsecenity that food should mount up in Europe while millions of people in Africa and other parts of the Third world are starving.

Sir. Geoffrey Howe: I cannot begin to share the hon. Gentleman's view that the common agricultural policy is obscene, or anything like it. The common agricultural policy was conceived to achieve a number of objectives, all of which are important — first, the production of ample food resources in Europe; secondly, the achievement of reasonable prices; and, thirdly, the achievement of both those aims in a fashion that protects the living standards of those who work in the agricultural community. All those objectives have been achieved, but, unfortunately, they have involved the production of surpluses in some commodities at high cost to the taxpayers. There is nothing unique about that in the common agricultural policy. Agricultural protection policies in, for example, the United States cost similar amounts. The task of controlling agricultural subsidies and producing a sensible agricultural policy is bound to take time, and that is why we want to reform, but not destroy, the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Maclennan: Has the Foreign Secretary made plain to the French Government directly the wholly unacceptable nature of their refusal to implement the arrangements for the milk quota?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have made it plain to all the Community Governments that implementation of the quota regime established as a result of decisions taken on 31 March is of fundamental importance. It is, in fact, crucial that that regime should be observed throughout the Community.

Mr. Budgen: What hope is there of general reform of the CAP when the first tentative steps towards reform through the super levy are being evaded or delayed by West Germany, France and Italy?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is plainly necessary and essential to press for the full implementation of the super levy, as agreed, as a foundation for that stage of the reform.

Mr. Robin Cook: Has the Foreign Secretary noted the statement by French officials that they agreed to this week's statement on budget discipline because it allowed sufficient flexibility to continue with the CAP? As France is patently making no effort to control its extravagant and growing agricultural surpluses, why should the House agree to increase own resources to continue to subsidise those surpluses?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Because the formulation on budgetary discipline which is coming close to agreement and endorsement is an undertaking that will bind the Council. It is an obligation that will also bind the Commission. It will serve to fulfil the need for effective implementation of the Fontainebleau conclusions.

Points of Order

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Due to your many and varied activities, you might not be aware that Dr. Mahmut Dikerdem and five of his colleagues have been released from prison. They were imprisoned because of activities in the Turkish Peace Association. I wanted to ask the Foreign Secretary about this matter on question No. 5. You did not allow any supplementary questions on the question about Turkey. On the next question, which I agree is equally important, you allowed five supplementary questions. I wondered whether we could have more supplementary questions on Turkey in future.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. We allow 20 minutes for EEC questions, and I am not complaining about that, but we allocate only 40 minutes for the rest of the world. When one recognises that certain matters such as South Africa and central America, all rather important issues, could not be raised today—if you look at the Order Paper you will see questions 10, 12 and so on—it seems to me that the amount of time allocated to foreign affairs is far from sufficient. Will you bear that in mind, and ask the Leader of the House whether this matter could be reviewed through the usual channels?

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is it connected with that matter?

Mr. Faulds: It is another matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall deal with this point of order first. I shall take them one at a time.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Having just chaired the Labour party conference, I have the deepest sympathy for you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am greatly obliged. In answer to the point of order, may I say that we made slow progress today on foreign affairs questions. I entirely accept the point made by the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) about the shortage of time for foreign affairs questions, but that is not a matter for me. It is a matter for the usual channels, and not a point of order. I have to make a judgment every day on what the House considers to be the most important subjects. I judged today—I hope that I was not incorrect—that the Falklands, Ethiopia and the situation in the middle east were of paramount importance.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If this is within your province, which I think it is, at this early stage in the new Parliament will you discourage the seemingly growing practice whereby official Opposition spokesmen more and more frequently ask questions from the Back Benches as ordinary Members, thereby reducing the time for Back Benchers on both sides to put legitimate questions?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that that is legitimate. Every Member must have the opportunity to put his question at Question Time. It is a different matter when calling a speaker in a debate.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether I could draw to your attention the embarrassment and inconvenience caused to hon. Members when a question on the Order Paper is called but not fulfilled because the Member is not present. In my case, I particularly wanted to ask a question—I had formulated quite a clever supplementary question—but was not able to ask it. The point that I wish to put to you, Mr. Speaker, is that I hope that hon. Members who cannot be in their place to respond when their questions are called by you should let you know, and perhaps we could be advised that they will not be here.

Mr. Speaker: Order. A great many hon. Members—indeed, most hon. Members—let me know if they are unable to be here at Question Time. That is a courtesy that we should continue. Mr. Faulds.

Mr. Faulds: At last Sir, thank you. As to supplementaries, what should some of us do—[Interruption.] I do that all right. What should some of us do to ensure that our apparent invisibility can be even momentarily lifted?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am very sorry that I was unable to get the hon. Gentleman in today. [Interruption.] It is a serious matter. There is a very short time for foreign affairs questions, but it is not a matter for me. After a long recess, there are many questions that hon. Members wish to ask about countries that they may have visited. Today it would not have been possible to get every hon. Member in who wished to ask a supplementary question. I am very sorry about it.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Do you not recall that it was not so long ago that we had 55 minutes for foreign affairs questions and that they took place once every three weeks rather than once every four weeks? Would it be possible for you to take up that matter in view of the complaints that have been made on both sides of the House, and to ask the usual channels to look at the matter once again?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The most effective course would be for the hon. Gentleman to do that himself. It is not a matter for the Chair.

Schools and Further Education

Mr. Speaker: I should tell the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.38 pm

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): I beg to move,

That this House, believing that the future of the nation depends on developing the skills and abilities of all children and sharing the concern felt by parents and teachers about inadequate educational provision in many parts of the country, deplores the squeeze on educational spending which, as reports of Her Majesty's Inspectorate have warned, are already threatening standards in schools and colleges, and believes that investment in education ought to be improved and increased.

Last January the Secretary of State made a speech at Sheffield to the north of England education conference in which he set out a plan for raising standards. He modestly called the plan bold and ambitious, but realistic. One week ago the Secretary of State was complacently puffing the same plan in the Queen's Speech, but today, nearly one year after the Sheffield speech, the House is entitled to more than a complacent puff. It is entitled to an honest assessment of how much has beeen achieved.

As the Secretary of State knows, I welcomed the Sheffield speech because it accepted that comprehensive schools had standards and because it was a sign that at last the Government were beginning to concentrate on some of the real educational issues—the curriculum, examinations, teaching quality and the rest. However, we were always sceptical about the Secretary of State's ability to deliver. I expressed three anxieties at the time. The first concerned resources. Here was the Secretary of State talking about raising standards when his advisers, Her Majesty's Inspectors were warning him that the squeeze on resources was undermining the standards of provision in many areas.

Our second worry was that unemployment and social deprivation, a great deal of which has been caused by the Government, was making the job of teachers and schools far more difficult.

My third warning and worry was more personal. The Secretary of State's track record as a Minister is scarcely reassuring. Not even his most enthusiastic supporters can be confident about the prospects of success of a Minister who, in previous incarnations, brought off the incredible hat-trick of being one of the most fervent advocates of high-rise flats, being the man who carried out the disastrous reorganisation of the National Health Service and being responsible for introducing to British industry, at great public expense, Mr. Ian MacGregor.

I must observe, though with more sorrow than anger, that the Secretary of State's strategy is now running into the sands. There are two principal reasons for that. The first is the manner in which he has attempted to carry out his plans. The second is his failure to win additional resources to back the plans. As regards the Secretary of State's performance, I congratulate him on his decision in principle to introduce the 16-plus, but we want to see how it works out in practice. We also want the resources to go with it. Despite one or two good things, he has undermined the prospect of eventual success by his tendency to believe that he knows best, that he can change education by Elizabeth house diktat, by his abrasive handling of the educational partners, especially teachers, and because he has handed over a large part of education to the Manpower Services Commission.

I should like to give two examples of the Secretary of State's high-handed approach. In his Green Paper on parental involvement he rejected the advice of the educational community which favoured a balanced solution. Instead, the Secretary of State proposed that there should be a majority of parents on school governing bodies. Not surprisingly, his proposals have been opposed by virtually everyone in the education community, especially organisations that represent parents. Then we had the Secretary of State's extraordinary peace studies initiative. Despite having received only seven complaints —I know there were only seven, because I asked him— he alleged without a shred of evidence that teachers and local authorities were teaching in a biased way.

The Secretary of State has spent most of the year issuing a stream of circulars and papers from the dizzy heights of Elizabeth house, but he has made little effort to enter a real dialogue with those whom he seeks to influence—local authorities, educationists, teachers and parents. The Secretary of State simply fails to understand that one cannot bring about change in British education by diktat. There must be dialogue, consensus and partnership. The right hon. Gentleman's handling of the teachers has been especially crass. Everybody knows that the Secretary of State's plans need the support of teachers, yet the right hon. Gentleman has continually criticised the teachers in a generalised fashion. He intervened disastrously in this year's pay negotiations and has now tried to short-circuit the Burnham negotiations on conditions of service by threatening to legislate unless teachers accept his version of assessment.

Finally, the right hon. Gentleman is not prepared to stick up for education. He encouraged the invasion by the Manpower Services Commission of the secondary school curriculum, under the guise of the technical and vocational education initiative. We have also seen the abject capitulation of the Secretary of State when he decided without consultation to hand over large parts of further education to the MSC. Only united resistance by local authorities and trade unions, and an intelligent volte-face by the new chairman, have created the opportunity for a constructive compromise. It is as yet no more than an opportunity, and no thanks are due to the Secretary of State even for that.

Now there is the appointment of Lord Young. Who is responsible for the education of the 14-to-18 age group —the Secretary of State, or Lord Young? Does the Secretary of State agree with Lord Young that the school leaving age should be lowered to 14? We are entitled to know. To sum up, the truth is that the right hon. Gentleman's performance in carrying out his plans has not lived up to his initial promise at Sheffield.

I know that the Secretary of State does not like hearing about cash. To make him feel good for a moment, I can assure him that the Labour party understands as well as he does that raising the level of educational achievement is not just a question of money. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am glad to hear that roar of approval from the Conservative Benches. Raising the level of educational achievement is also — as the latest report by Her Majesty's inspectors points out—about improving the match between the qualifications and experience of teachers and the jobs that they are called upon to do, raising the effectiveness of teachers' perceptions of the needs and potentials of pupils, varying teaching styles and approaches, and improving the ability to manage.

[Mr. Giles Radice]

However, as the report also points out, even those processes are not cost-free. If we want the right teachers in the right places, if we want adequate provision of books and equipment and if we want schools and colleges that are decently maintained, we must provide the necessary resources. Our case against the Government is that they are failing to provide the money to finance the existing system adequately, let alone the improvements which the Secretary of State wants.

During the past year I have had the opportunity and good fortune to travel to the north, south, east and west of our country and visit over 150 schools and colleges. On the whole, I have found that the teachers are doing a good job, that the children and students are well taught and that much is being achieved. However, in many areas, shortages and deficiencies are becoming glaringly obvious. There are shortages of teachers in key subjects such as mathematics, physics, crafts and design, there are inadequate supplies of books and model equipment, and there are leaking roofs and peeling walls. There is also the growth of pay-as-you-learn. Parents are paying not just for extras but for the basics of education. That is wrong in principle, and unfair on the areas which are less prosperous.

If the Secretary of State believes that I am a subjective witness, he should consider the HMI reports, which are based on visits to nearly 1,500 schools, and on examples from all 97 local education authorities. The latest report shows a shortage of books in one fifth of lessons seen in primary schools; unsatisfactory provision of books and equipment in two fifths of local authorities; moderate or substantial parental contributions in three quarters of schools visited; and more reliance on parents than before. What should worry the Secretary of State especially is that in only 14 local education authorities was the provision regarded by the HMI as satisfactory in all respects.

The Secretary of State cannot say that the position is improving when he receives the sort of report that was published last week on educational provision in Norfolk. HMI, his advisers, warned him that,

> "The officers, advisers and teachers . . . are all operating in a system that not only has no slack in it, but which is already decidely over-stretched."

The report also spells out clearly that schools will be unable to meet national demands for improved standards without more funds. The Secretary of State should take that seriously. I am glad that, unlike some Conservative chairs, Mrs. Gillian Shephard welcomed the report and said:

> "It gives us strong evidence for our discussions with those who set the levels of Government grant."

That is a sensible attitude.

While on the subject of the HMI, I hope that the Secretary of State will take the opportunity this afternoon to reaffirm its independence and to dissociate himself from the ludicrous and biased inquiry about the role of the HMI conducted among Conservative chairmen—an inquiry in which his junior Minister was so unwisely and perhaps predictably involved. The Secretary of State should at least understand that shooting the messenger will do nothing to improve our children's education.

A reading of all the HMI reports—the Secretary of State prides himself on reading them all—shows that Norfolk is not an isolated example; in some areas, its spending is near the average for the shires. The Secretary of State should consider the lower spenders, such as Somerset, West Sussex and Hereford and Worcester. Not only the shires have problems. Dudley's director of education has issued a cry for help——

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): I take the hon. Gentleman's point about Norfolk because I represent a Norfolk constituency. However, does he agree that it did not help Norfolk education authority's case for improving resources in the education budget to maintain school buildings and equipment when the settlement to the teachers was above the going rate and above what had been agreed? That meant a reduction in resources for the areas to which the HMI report drew attention.

Mr. Radice: The settlement was not above the going rate; it was above the Secretary of State's assumption about pay. The Secretary of State got it wrong, and we cannot blame the teachers for that. Teachers' pay is still far below the level that it reached under the Labour Government.

The director of education in Dudley said that some schools had not been painted for nearly 20 years, and nearly 50 of his schools were inadequately cleaned. He further said:

> "The disgraceful state of the committee's schools is now undermining morale, lowering educational expectations and militating against a sound education for the borough's pupils."

There were many other examples as well.

I know that the Secretary of State's stock answer to all such criticism is that a lot of money is already being spent on education, and what is needed now is redeployment of resources. The Secretary of State's announcement on the abolition of minimum grant and the charging of tuition fees has shocked many parents and pupils. The announcement on tuition fees was the latest development of pay-as-you-learn. Parents of many thousands of students will be expected not only to meet in full the living costs of their sons and daughters but some of the costs of their education as well. Does the Secretary of State plan to introduce a scheme for charging parents full-cost fees as charged to overseas students, of £3,500 for art subject students and £7,000 for medical students? What are his future plans? I am sure that many constituents of Conservative Members will be anxious to hear what the Secretary of State has to say this afternoon.

No doubt the Secretary of State will also tell the House that the provision for education and science in 1985-86 is to be increased by just over 4 per cent. In real terms that represents a slight decrease in total spending. He will probably refer to the so-called planned increase of 6 per cent. in local authority spending on education. However, I hope that he will admit, because he knows it perfectly well, that the £10,259 million put aside for local authority spending on education is a peculiar figure.

The education expenditure steering group, which contains some of the Secretary of State's officials, confirmed that merely to maintain existing policies the Government would need to give local education authorities £10,734 million or £475 million more than the amount that the Government are planning for 1985-86. I am sure that the Secretary of State will confirm those figures, because they have already been confirmed by his officials.

Before the Secretary of State leaps up and tells me that I have forgotten the unallocated margin of £600 million —he always tells me that—I assure him that I have not forgotten it, but I believe that education will not get much more than 50 per cent. of that unallocated margin. The truth is, and the Secretary of State knows it, that the majority of local education authorities are likely to be worse off and not better off as a consequence of the Government spending plans for 1985-86. His officials have already admitted that.

The next stage of the Secretary of State's argument is that the existing resources should be redeployed or better used. Those are the Secretary of State's polite phrases for saying that there should be cuts. However, let the voters be clear. The Secretary of State wants local authorities to make further cuts in school meals and milk, and that is said in his press release. Despite the High Court judgment in the Kent case, he also wants dinner ladies to take cuts in negotiated levels of wages and conditions.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Why not?

Mr. Radice: Because they are extremely badly paid already.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: I know of local education authorities that have reorganised the employment of dinner ladies, have brought in part-time workers rather than full-time workers and have saved a lot of money. They are quite happy, and this can happen in other areas as well.

Mr. Radice: I am glad to take the hon. Gentleman's word for it that they are happy. But that is not my impression going round local authorities. I have met many dinner ladies who are extremely unhappy. Often they have no choice. Either they accept or they have no jobs. A pistol is being held to their heads. However, it remains true that since 1944 school meals have played an important part in our education service.

Then the Secretary of State turns to what he describes as the so-called extravagant authorities. That is his doublespeak for the authorities that try to live up to their statutory obligations and which, as the ILEA polls show, have the support of their voters for so doing. However, the right hon. Gentleman never explains how cuts in the budgets of these authorities——

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Haringey?

Mr. Radice: If the hon. Lady wishes to intervene, I shall give way to her when I have completed my sentence. The right hon. Gentleman never explains how cuts in the budgets of these authorities will help authorities such as Norfolk, which need to spend more. To take the example of the largest authority, if ILEA followed the advice of the Secretary of State and spent at its Government-set target level it would begin to attract the central Government money which it does not get now. The result would be not more central Government money for such counties as Norfolk but less. That is the reality, and I should like the Secretary of State to confirm it.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: How does the hon. Gentleman explain that Haringey's cost per unit is the second highest, yet it was roundly condemned for its standards by Her Majesty's inspectors?

Mr. Radice: In my view the chairman of the education committee was absolutely right. She said that she would take the HMI report very seriously, unlike some Conservative chairmen. We in the Labour party have never suggested that every aspect of education was perfect and that such problems as it had could always be solved by money. Money has to be properly used. However, we do not say that it is possible to improve the situation by cutting, which seems to be the policy of the Conservative party.

What makes matters even worse is that the Government's policies are so perverse that if such authorities as Norfolk and Dudley try to raise more resources through the rates, they immediately run into the Government's targets and penalties system. That is a classic "Catch 22" situation. Her Majesty's inspectors say that they think an authority ought to spend more. The Department of the Environment says that it cannot and that, if it does, it will lose money. The victims of this absurdity are the children who are the nation's future.

The question for the Secretary of State to answer is when and how he will live up to his obligations and provide the extra resources for the low-spending authorities. It is a question that he constantly ducks. He does not want to answer it. He never has so far.

R. H. Tawney wrote:

> "What a wise parent would desire for his own children a nation, in so far as it is wise, must desire for all children."

Every wise parent wants access to nursery education for three to four-year-olds. Every wise parent wants a high standard of decently resourced primary and secondary education. Every wise parent wants a decent education and training for 16 to 19-year-olds leading either to jobs or to well-resourced further education or into a far more open system of higher education.

I recognise that these are ambitious objectives. But if we are to survive and prosper as a country in the 21st century we shall need this kind of education provision. If the Secretary of State asks where the money is to come from, my initial reply is that such a question is downright impertinent coming from the main architect of the policies that squeezed our economy more severely than that of any other major industrial country in 1981, tore the heart out of British industry and, as the right hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Sir I. Gilmour) pointed out in Monday's Guardian, created 2 million extra unemployed.

My second reply is that, even on the Government's assumption of economic growth contained in the Green Paper on spending plans for the next 10 years, there is room for extra education expenditure. There is no doubt about that.

My third reply is that under a Labour Government our economy will grow faster and we shall be able to spend more on education. We cannot help doing better than this Government.

My final reply is that as a nation we cannot afford not to invest in education. Investing in our future.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Sir Keith Joseph): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'believes that the future of this nation depends on developing the skills and abilities of all children; congratulates Her Majesty's Government on its policies for raising standards of education for all abilities by action on the curriculum, examinations and teaching quality; and welcomes Her Majesty's Government's policies for securing the most effective use of the substantial resources available for the benefit of the education service.'.

I shall try to answer the questions posed by the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) as I go through what I have to say. However, at the beginning of my remarks, because he attempted to flaunt his party's record and prospects, I must mildly take issue with some of his comments.

Looking at the record, one sees that the growth rate under the 1979 and so far under the 1984 Conservative Governments is substantially higher per annum than it was under the Labour Government of 1974-79, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer pointed out yesterday, and was not interrupted when he did so by any Opposition Member.

Mr. Radice rose——

Sir Keith Joseph: No. I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. My remarks are on the record, and the hon. Gentleman should refer to the report of yesterday's proceedings in Hansard.

When it comes to which party has cut public expenditure most fiercely, I am slightly ashamed to say that I have to give the palm to the last Labour Government. When they had to call in the International Monetary Fund, they succeeded in cutting public expenditure more fiercely than we, for the benefit of taxpayers and the public as a whole, have so far managed to do.

The hon. Member for Durham, North produced the piety that a Labour Government would preside over greater growth. On the records of Labour Governments it is highly unlikely that a future Labour Government would intend to spend more on education. But can the hon. Gentleman give the House a commitment that, if there is another Labour Government, he is authorised to say that more than he inherits will be spent on education?

Mr. Radice: Yes, I am authorised to say that. I also say that the country is only just beginning to recover from the tremendous onslaught of the policies associated with the Secretary of State on manufacturing output. We are only just recovering from the level of manufacturing output that there was in 1979. I invite the right hon. Gentleman to look at the facts. My right hon. Friend the Shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer made the same point, and he was not interrupted by the Chancellor. I remind the Secretary of State that the Labour Government spent £600 million more on education than on defence whereas the Conservatives are spending £3·5 billion more on defence than on education. It is a matter of priority.

Sir Keith Joseph: I fear that the hon. Gentleman has added to the credibility gap which I believe will prevent the Labour party from ever being re-elected. He has added to the infinite number of pledges given by the Labour party which failed to convince the voting public at the last election and will fail again.

It has proved no easy task for any Government, Labour or Conservative, to control public spending. It is as though the Government of the day were struggling like Laocoon with the snakes of public expenditure without ever quite vanquishing the commitments from the past. Nevertheless, the Labour party deserves some credit for facing the difficulties because it was the Labour Government who invented cash limits. The Opposition should take pride in having designed that instrument to try to limit the burdens on taxpayers and ratepayers.

The hon. Gentleman cannot escape by quoting the old relativities of defence and education spending because his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition has warned the Labour party that for a Labour Government to move from nuclear to conventional emphasis would require at least as much, if not more, spending to secure the country's defence, which he properly accepts as a top priority. That being so, Labour spokesmen cannot expect to raid defence spending for easy transfer to social spending. They will have to grapple with the same problems as we face.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Keith Joseph: No, I am anxious to make progress. I rejoice that there is some common ground between the two sides. Both sides want improved standards and both sides accept that adequate resources are an essential ingredient. We may argue about what is adequate, but just as the hon. Member for Durham, North accepts that resources are not the only ingredient, so we accept that resources must be adequate.

Where the hon. Member for Durham, North went wrong was in criticising the resources available for education in 1985-86. The result of the Government announcements is that in 1985-86 education will be £600 million better off than in 1984-85 after allowing for the abolition of national insurance surcharge and the transfer of £64 million to the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Radice: That is not a real increase.

Sir Keith Joseph: Of course, it is not a real increase to the tune of 6 per cent. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has forecast 4½ per cent. inflation, so there is a real increase of 1½ per cent. In addition, however, one must take into account falling school rolls—a further significant reduction is expected compared with the current year — although the smaller population of students will probably rise by one quarter less than the fall in the school population. However one looks at the figures, there is a substantial improvement. Nevertheless, I accept that many authorities will find it hard to do all that they want to do even with that extra provision.

Mr. Radice: Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that the majority of local authorities will be better or worse off as a result of the spending plans announced on Monday?

Sir Keith Joseph: Comparing 1985-86 with 1984-85, most of them will be—[HON. MEMBERS: "Worse off."] No, I am seeking the right adjective. Most of them will be usefully—I cannot say "substantially" and I am cautious about saying "significantly"—better off. The overspenders, of course, will not be better off and the local situation must depend to some extent on the extent to which the school population and the student population in the area meet the national average.

When we have finished arguing about these important minutiae, the fact remains that after years of constant criticism from the hon. Gentleman the pupil-teacher ratio is lower than ever before and expenditure per child is at record high levels. I accept that local education authorities have to grapple with all the problems of diseconomies of scale, but the House should take those two substantial criteria into account.

In replying to the various criticisms, I wish first to justify the Government's constant emphasis on the scope in many education authorities for redeployment of resources to higher priority education expenditure from lower priority education expenditure. For example, about 30 local education authorities, including a couple of Labour-controlled authorities, have achieved substantial savings on school meals by various means which I shall be happy to spell out for the record if anyone wishes to cross-examine me. I do not believe that those authorities are harder hearted than others. They are simply better custodians in the interests of the children of the very large amounts of public money made available to them.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): During his visits to schools, the right hon. Gentleman must have seen children eating just chips and gravy or chips and curry for their lunch. That certainly worries me. Does it not worry the Secretary of State?

Sir Keith Joseph: Children from households where there is poverty — households receiving family income supplement or supplementary benefit — are entitled to free school meals and those free meals are provided everywhere in England. If other children are provided by their parents with less than we would regard as desirable, or prefer to feed themselves in some particular way, we may well regret that, but I do not believe that there is a case for returning to the old universality.

I must also emphasise that there are other ways to save money for redeployment within education. I congratulate the local education world for its continuing effort to take out surplus places. It is not a popular task and it is laborious, but we are on the way to the target of 1 million surplus places being taken out of use set by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) or his predecessor in office to be achieved by spring 1987. Nevertheless, there is scope for still futher redeployment.

The hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) intervened effectively to point out that money provided for maintenance in the education allocation would have been adequate if it had been used regularly for that purpose over the previous decades — which it has not been in every case by any manner of means — to fulfil at least a respectable slice of maintenance. But, as my hon. Friend says, there is all too often a raid upon the maintenance provision — indeed, a raid upon book and equipment provision — when teachers manage to negotiate with their employers a larger pay increase than has been provided for them. Teachers have not yet come to terms with the fact that when they succeed in raising their pay increase it is at the expense of teacher numbers or other provisions in the local authority budgets.

Mr. Foster : How much of the Secretary of State's boast about the record pupil-teacher ratio is as a result of the so-called raids upon other aspects of the education budget and also the so-called overspending authorities? Is he not on the one hand boasting about a record pupil-teacher ratio and on the other criticising those authorities which have been giving him the results?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, there is an element of truth in that, but the hon. Gentleman and I may share the view that there is still room for redeployment of money if only more local authorities would copy the example of the economies achieved by some of their colleagues.

The hon. Member for Durham, North made an assertion about what would happen if ILEA managed to reduce its spending to such a level that it once again received grant from the taxpayer. I confirm that his analysis is correct.

The hon. Gentleman made much play of the shortages revealed by Her Majesty's inspectorate's annual report on the effects of local education authorities' expenditure policies. He is right to draw attention to them — they concern us all — but he is wrong to imply that those shortages are new and that matters have generally become worse under this Government. What a pity the previous Labour Government did not publish the HMI reports. They might have given the hon. Gentleman cause to look at the questions a little more deeply.

Let us be clear what Her Majesty's inspectorate did say in the most recent report. It found that in autumn 1983 there was over the country as a whole a small improvement in the levels of appropriate resources in schools and colleges, particularly as regards the provision of teachers and books.

Mr. Radice: Read the next sentence.

Sir Keith Joseph: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to say what I want to say.

I pointed many times to the significant improvement in pupil-teacher ratios under this Government. It is not just a statistical phenomenon. It is having its effect in schools. Thus, this year Her Majesty's inspectorate reported that in about one eighth of the schools visited their performance was judged to be adversely affected by one or both of an insufficient number of teachers, or by the presence of teachers whose initial qualifications and subsequent experience did not match the jobs required of them. Four years ago Her Majesty's inspectorate reported that almost one fifth of schools did not have satisfactory provision of teachers. That shows that there has been a marked improvement. Of course, there is scope for further advance, but the situation is not, as the hon. Gentleman implied, getting worse.

Mr. Radice: I hope that the House will forgive this textual analysis, but I did ask the Secretary of State to read out the sentence following the one which he quoted, and he did not. Let me read it now:

"But these improvements were patchy between and within LEAs, phases of education and institutions, and must be seen against the low baselines of some aspects of provision noted in previous years."

Sir Keith Joseph: Surely the hon. Gentleman is emphasising the point that I made. If the Labour Government had published Her Majesty's inspectorate's reports earlier, they would have revealed even worse base lines—that is what the report is saying—than they are legitimately criticising now.

[Sir Keith Joseph]

I accept that none of the HMI reports has presented a wholly satisfactory picture and that this year's was no exception. For instance, it drew particular attention, as the hon. Gentleman says, to the patchiness of improvements around the country—both betweeen LEAs and schools within authorities—and to the deterioration of school and college premises because of inadequate repairs and maintenance. On both counts I share the inspectorate's concern.

But we cannot solve the problems simply by spending vastly more. The country just cannot afford it. Unemployment would go even higher if we tried to do so. We must look also to the need to secure better value for the money that we are spending.

The HMI report is useful on that aspect, too. The inspectorate makes it clear that in many cases there is scope for bettter de[illegible]xisting resources and for better perceptions by heads [illegible] teachers of resources needed for good education, as well as, in some cases, absolute increases in the levels of resources.

Her Majesty's inspectorate identified the factors most commonly influencing effective learning as the quality of teaching, the identification of pupil and student needs, the levels of resources available, and the ability to manage and deploy those resources. It stated firmly that without clearer agreement about what it is that the resources are intended to help achieve and consequent careful planning and development, and without adequate and continuing training for teachers, the addition of more, different and better quality material resources will not of itself maintain present quality levels or lead to desirable changes and improvements.

That is the task that faces us, and in facing it we would all do well to avoid over-simplification of what is a complex question—the relationship between levels of resources for education and its quality.

I want to emphasise at this point what a difficult task teachers have if they are to be effective. That is why I regard the present teachers' salary structure talks as so important. They range across many aspects of teachers' work and recognise the need to relate that work and the way in which it is rewarded to changing circumstances.

The main ingredients of a successful outcome from those talks will provide for a closer relationship, more amenable to local education authority management, between teachers' pay, performance and responsibilities; a more precise definition of teachers' duties, including the supervision of pupils at midday and the provision of classroom cover for absent teachers; systematic arrangements for the formal appraisal of the performance of all teachers linked to provision for in-service training, promotion and deployment, and enabling the best teachers to be appropriately rewarded.

As I said in the House last Thursday, I should like to see a successful outcome from those talks because satisfactory agreements on those issues would lead to improvements in the quality of education offered by our schools. Therefore, I hope that the representatives of the local authorities and the teachers' unions engaged in the discussions will be successful, although I recognise the problems of bringing complex negotiations in that field to a satisfactory conclusion.

Reform proposals will need to pass three stringent tests if they are to come to fruition. First, they must be negotiable between the parties. Secondly, they need to be educationally acceptable and hold the realistic promise of delivering improvements in the classroom. Thirdly, they must be affordable. As for the latter, I hope that the teachers' leaders will not mislead their members, as they did earlier this year in the 1984 negotiations, as to what level of pay settlement might be regarded as reasonable.

The autumn statement made earlier this week by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor shows that the Government fully intend to keep faith with the inescapable fact that we cannot spend more on public services such as education than is consistent with the country's ability to pay. To do otherwise would put us back on the destructive road to wage-push inflation and still higher levels of unemployment.

The hon. Member for Durham, North asked me about the Sheffield speech and the progress under it. The speech announced the fourfold Government initiative that is intended, with the help of teachers, local education authorities and parents, to raise the standards of children of all abilities in our schools. I have never pretended that that speech did more than set in place the necessary conditions for the raising of standards.

I remind the House briefly that the four parallel initiatives cover the more rigorous selection and training of teachers, an attempt to reach a national agreement on the curriculum, a transformation of examinations towards clearer absolute assessment and the introduction of records of achievement so that children's performances outside the classroom can be assessed and recorded. All four initiatives are progressing according to the publicly announced timetable. Again, I cannot pretend that they have yet begun to have an effect, and I hope that no hon. Member will chide me for that, as there was never any pretence that they could have an instantaneous effect. However, the schedules are all as announced.

I turn to an area upon which I believe the whole House can unite in seeking more information. I refer to research into what explains the different standards in different schools. I announced in the House on 1 March 1984 that I had asked the Department to undertake two studies before considering the potential for further research into school standards. I have now received reports on the two studies and these will be published shortly. Copies are being placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

The first of these studies extends the earlier analysis by the Department, published as statistical bulletin 16/83, of factors affecting examination results in different local education authority areas. It shows an even higher correlation—over 70 per cent.—than the earlier analysis between examination achievements at school and social background factors, probably reflecting the more recent information available for these factors. I explained in my earlier statement that it was expected that the extended study would provide limited insight into the effect of other factors on examination results. In the event, after taking account of the effect of social background—I stress that — the new study shows no more than a slight relationship at local authority level between pupils' examination achievements and the level of resources, including teaching resources, available to their schools, and a similarly slight statistical relationship with the proportion of pupils in grammar schools.

The second study was designed to examine the scope for carrying out further research on these relationships at the level of individual schools or groups of schools. This study also shows a strong statistical relationship between examination results and social background factors, and again does not show a very substantial relationship with other factors such as the level of resources available to the schools. It also demonstrates the difficulty of extracting suitable data on social background factors from census material. Difficulties over the use and interpretation of data relevant to social background are also indicated by research commissioned by the Department and undertaken by the university of Leeds, which examined, inter alia, the development of suitable measures of home background. A report on this research is being prepared. I impose all this on the House because it is the background against which we can make further progress.

The two studies carried out by the Department thus show a strong relationship between school pupils' examination results and socio-economic background, but they shed little light on the influence of other factors on school pupils' performance, or on the wide variation in examination achievements among pupils from similar socio-economic backgrounds. I believe that it would now be research into the factors giving rise to this wide variation, which may be factors related to the way the school carries out its work rather than external to the school, which is likely to be most relevant to the development of the Government's policies for improving standards in schools, particularly if the research also includes other measures of pupil performance.

I have concluded that I would not be justified in providing funds for more research along the lines of the Department's recent studies. I am, however, willing to consider proposals for research ranging more widely and exploring the relationship between the social background of pupils collected at the level of individual pupils, a range of school outputs including public examinations, and a range of school inputs such as resources, the achievements of pupils on entry to secondary schools, teaching quality, the organisation of the school and its internal practices including teacher expectations, curriculum continuity and homework. Such research would be complex and expensive and could not be expected to yield results in less than three years. I shall want the Department to discuss any proposals in detail with the applicants before I decide on financial support.

Since that offers help only over the middle distance, I shall tell the House of a new initiative that may help in the slightly nearer future. Hon. Members will be aware that in announcing the Government's decision to adopt a single system of examination at 16, the Government also announced their intention that there should be distinction awards to recognise the breadths and levels of performance of those whose new GCSE grades and subjects reach a defined standard. The Government intend to add another level below distinction to encourage both the breadth and level of performance. Below the distinction award, we propose to introduce an award that will be called a merit award, which will recognise a breadth and level of achievement that is lower than that of the distinction award but which is still commendably wide and high. I hope that that will prove to be a further stimulus towards excellence.

Mr. Radice: Is that not reintroducing the O-level by another name?

Sir Keith Joseph: No such thought is in my mind. The award stands self-justified by its objective. In due course, I shall spell out the definition.

The Government and I were chided for the announced increase in the parental contributions made to some students in higher education. However, the Government have no plans to charge parents the same amount as overseas students. The purpose of that extra contribution is, first, to meet the cost of higher student awards; and secondly, to enable the Government to provide some more badly-needed money for basic research in universities and through the research councils. I believe that the strong national asset of basic scientific research should be supported in that way, and that is why the Government have asked the families of students to pay the extra contributions.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): My right hon. Friend will appreciate the problem of many of his supporters, who find it very difficult to justify this increasing tax on families, many of whom have other children at home and large financial commitments as a result, when at the same time we are increasing the payment to farmers who have had a bumper record harvest this year. Is there no way of squaring this circle? How does my right hon. Friend intend to deal with those students who have obtained places in higher education and who are deemed to be receiving parental contributions sufficient to pay towards the fees, if the parents do not cough up the money? Will there be sentries on the gates to stop them getting into their classes, or what will happen?

Sir Keith Joseph: I have no answer to either limb of my hon. Friend's question. The world is not a perfect place and no Government have yet managed to secure that all parents provide what their children need. That means that those children must show initiative in coping with the problem. Mercifully, I am not responsible for agriculture.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does not the Secretary of State agree that it is important that all young people should be treated equally? Does he realise that some girls whose parents come from the Indian sub-continent have considerable problems because their parents do not consider that they should go on to higher education? Consequently, their parents will not fill in the application form for a grant; thus, although the family may be on an extremely low income, those girls will lose any grant. Furthermore, they will have to find their own fees if they go on to higher education. Is that not an extremely unfortunate development from those proposals?

Sir Keith Joseph: If the hon. Gentleman has a way of overcoming the problem I should be glad to hear it.

I hope that I have answered the questions asked by the hon. Member for Durham, North. I can report to the House that we are on schedule with the Sheffield policies, but we do not expect instant transformation from them. I have announced various initiatives in research and for the encouragement of standards. I have explained our support for discussions between local education authorities and teacher organisations which are broadly encouraging. I ask the House to vote for the amendment and against the Opposition motion.

4.40 pm

Mr. Sean Hughes (Knowsley, South): I am pleased that in the preface to his remarks the Secretary of State said that he was sure that both sides of the House were interested in improving education standards. Time and again his party has postured as the party committed to the maintenance and improvement of standards and quality. Tory Members have often pointed their fingers at the Opposition Benches and implied — if they have not openly accused — that we were opposed to good standards and quality in education. It is time to expose the fallacious premise on which the Tory party's claim is made.

After five years of Conservative Government and their proudly proclaimed commitment to quality and standard in education, what is the reality? In 1975 the Bullock report emphasised the importance of literacy, stressing that the ability to read was crucial, not just because we were becoming a society of form-fillers, but because the inability to read seriously impinges on individual freedom. A browse of Hansard just after the publication of that report reveals various examples of Government Members stressing the need for literacy and increased book provision in schools.

The Conservative party manifesto is not my favourite reading One section is entitled "Schools: The pursuit of excellence."

In response to the HMI paper on the curriculum entitled

"English from 5 to 16"

the Secretary of State emphasised the essential part that the teaching of English must play in the school curriculum. He said that English was

"a tool and a channel of learning in all subjects for the great majority of pupils in England and Wales."

On 6 November the Government pledged themselves to continue to develop policies to raise education standards. We must examine how the claims are borne out by the facts, as opposed to the soothing statements from the Department of Education and Science. I do not doubt the good faith of the Secretary of State and many Government Members. If they are committed to quality in education and the laudable aims in the Bullock report, we can presume that they have a commitment to the provision of books in schools. Reading is impossible without reading material. I am reminded of "Desert Island Discs" when the presenter asks a composer whether he would take records or scores to the island. The composer always chooses scores on the ground that he can hear the music in his head. We cannot expect teachers to tell the class, "Turn to page 57 of the textbook—in your head."

In 1978-79 expenditure on primary school books was £19·9 million. In 1982-83 it was £27·9 million. Taking into account a 14 per cent. drop in pupil numbers and the book price inflation rate, expenditure should now be £29·2 million. The shortfall is £1·3 million.

National averages and national figures are meaningless in a country with such huge regional variations. In my borough of Knowsley spending on books per primary school pupil was £4·52 in 1982-83. That sum was worth only £2·65 at 1978-79 prices. The drop is 12·8 per cent., using the book price index. Knowsley spends 41 per cent. of its total budget on education. It is all the more surprising that the Secretary of State, when asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) whether he would seek additional money for education, replied that he was not convinced that, overall, more was needed. The minuscule increase in the Chancellor's statement does not alter that. I wonder what sort of earthquake it will take to convince the Secretary of State and other Ministers of the need for more expenditure on education.

There are areas of utter wretchedness in the country, although one might not have thought so when listening to the Chancellor's statement on Monday. Part and parcel of that wretchedness is educational deprivation. John Hughes wrote in The Guardian on 4 September:

"To focus the discussion on the links between poverty and deprivation in our communities and an improvised state education system is to raise issues of inequality in their most acute form. For we are not only neglecting and wasting human capital and potential on a vast scale; we are palpably undermining the assumptions, palpably repudiating the necessary value systems of any mature political and social democracy."

The reality is that in the deprived regions everything mitigates against an individual's educational development. Massive unemployment rates, a decaying environment, life in an overcrowded upstairs maisonette, hardly creates an atmosphere conducive to self-fulfilment. The oasis of hope in such an environment has been the school. However, there, too, morale is collapsing.

Expenditure cuts have their visible effects in fewer books and equipment, deteriorating buildings and, as the HMI report of May 1984 states:

"In some cases the circumstances in which education takes place and the availability of appropriate resources in the right quantity was found to be such as to make worthwhile learning well-nigh impossible."

Equally pernicious, if not more so, is the invisible effect of expenditure cuts — the collapse of morale among parents, pupils and teachers. The Government emphasise such issues as parental choice, but we all know that parental choice works on the assumption that the majority of parents will not exercise it. Parents' morale is collapsing because reality for them in areas such as Knowsley is a dole queue, shortage of money and life in an area with a total lack of educational ethos. Parental choice for them is a sick and irrelevant joke.

Teachers' morale is collapsing in a contracting profession. Avenues of promotion are being closed rapidly. After 10 years, many teachers are simply worn out. Of course, there are good and bad teachers—there is good and bad in every profession. There are even good and bad Secretaries of State. But to hammer the teachers, as some Conservative Members do, when those teachers often give their all throughout an exhausting period is no way to improve standards and quality in our education system.

We must also consider pupil morale. I would like to see those centres of excellence referred to in the Tory manifesto in all our deprived areas. However, we must understand where we are now if we are realistically to build for the future. We are faced with the appalling paradox that it is in the areas of highest unemployment and greatest deprivation that the pressure is on the young people to leave school at 16.

In the MSC briefing on the careers service in London, it was noted that Barnet, with a staying-on rate at 16 of 72 per cent., found that 33 per cent. of those who left school were unlikely to find jobs. In Tower Hamlets, with a staying-on rate of 41 per cent., 62 per cent. of those who left school were unlikely to find jobs. My borough has a staying-on rate of 46 per cent., but during the past three years, first 85 per cent., and now 80 per cent., of our school leavers have been without permanent employment. That seriously affects what we are trying to do in our schools.

The Secretary of State told the House last week that it was a question of the relevance of the curriculum, the effectiveness of the teachers and support from the home.

He should have realised that those are precisely the things now at risk in the current climate of educational expenditure. That is why I place emphasis on the provision of books. The Secretary of State and the Government must realise the harsh, unpalatable fact that many youngsters, once they leave school, will never read a book again. School is the only place where people can be introduced to reading as something worthwhile in itself.

The HMI report commented on the instances of unsatisfactory educational provision. These relate precisely to the children who do not have a second chance for a decent education. That is why I was struck by the Secretary of State's choice of words in his speech last week. He used the word "affordability". I have checked a few dictionaries, but could not find any reference to that word. Unfortunately the Conservative party see affordability—if I must use that dreadful word—in money terms only. Just for once tonight, I hope that Conservative Members will discuss it in its wider context.

How can we, as a society, afford to waste the talents of so many of our young people? Even from a utilitarian point of view, it is crazy to squander the nation's single greatest resource. From the individual view—shared by those of us who, perhaps naively, see education as the means of self-fulfilment and enrichment and a means of conquering the often squalid conditions in which so many of our young people are born—affordability, as defined by the Secretary of State, demonstrates how the Government have all their priorities wrong. That is why I hope that the House will reject the amendment and support the motion.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): The hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes) mentioned teachers' pay. I welcome my right hon. Friend's remarks about the salary structure talks. Like him, and all hon. Members, I hope that they will be successful. It is essential to avoid another period of the classroom disruption that we saw earlier this year. Not only is that bad for classroom morale, but it runs strongly against the Government's efforts to raise standards and is destabilising for both teachers and children.

One thing that might help the public, and the teachers themselves, when considering the cost of salaries and the totality of education spending is a system by which we could know the actual running costs of each school. Parents and others could then see what it really costs, on a carefully broken-down basis, to run each school. Those figures should include any debt charges resulting from those schools having been built relatively recently.

I appreciate the problems of monitoring performance and rewarding efficiency in the teaching profession. The salary talks will be difficult. However, there is a case for asking for outside industrial advice if the talks run into difficulties. Industry has for many years monitored efficiency and rewarded performance and those involved in the teachers' negotiations could learn much from that.

The status of teachers is important. The changing role of their job and the need for more in-service training is changing public attitudes towards the profession. It is especially important for teachers to realise that they should be a stabilising influence on the children they teach. We must bear in mind the general unease caused by unemployment in many homes and, alas, the fact that so many children come from single-parent homes. Before we again find ourselves in any of the difficulties that we have experienced this year, I hope that the teaching profession will ponder long and hard on the influences for good that they can bring to bear.

There have been many quotations from the HMI report, especially by the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice). He left out one point that he should have included in his speech. In the principal findings section of the report it states:

> "It is apparent that teachers, schools, colleges and LEAs are providing an adequate education for the majority of pupils and students."

Mr. Radice: I acknowledged that point when quoting. I gave my impression, having visited more than 50 schools and colleges throughout the country.

Mr. Madel: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but Conservative Members would have appreciated greater emphasis on that point, especially as the hon. Gentleman spoke about what the Government should try to do.

The report says that the level of resources available and the ability to manage and deploy them by all levels in the service depends to a great extent on proper management of resources. It states:

> "In secondary schools, poor management of resources by the department or individual teacher was a particularly critical factor associated with those lessons seen in which the work was judged less than satisfactory."

That emphasises what Conservative Members have said in many of our debates. Unless the resources are properly and effectively managed, poor learning occurs and little is achieved—the very things that we all want to avoid.

My right hon. Friend, in a written answer on 12 November, referred to the provision for in-service training. If we do not improve that, the anxieties referred to in the HMI report will not be allayed. My right hon. Friend said:

> "Grant of £17·5 million will be available in the 1985-86 financial year."

My right hon. Friend then identified three projects, two of which are especially important in improving our education service. One is a special programme to support the introduction of the general certificate of secondary education, and the other is the teaching of craft, design and technology in schools. I hope that included in the budget figure will be an element to ensure that in managing those projects teachers will have an opportunity of learning something about management development and general ability to manage financial resources. The new examination system and the necessary improvement in craft, design and technology cannot be effective unless those managing them are up to date in the management of resources. I hope that some money will be available within the budget of £17·5 million for that purpose.

I commend the Government for their support for the establishment of British school technology. I do so for what British school technology is doing to encourage the development of technological education within schools and for the way in which it is helping in practical ways by running in-service courses for teachers and helping authorities plan and organise their provision in technolgical areas. It is a pity that no mention was made of that by the hon. Member for Durham, North. That is a definite plus to the Government, to the education service and to young people passing through the education service.

[Mr. Madel]

I fully support what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is doing in his new system of examinations in laying greater emphasis on practical tests. However, according to the Joint Council of Examination Boards, some schools do not as yet have the facilities to ensure that practical tests in science can be effectively carried out. An adjustment in local authority spending will be essential if practical tests in science are to be fully carried out in line with what the Government are proposing for the new system of examinations. Where local authorities do that and have to spend more to ensure that what they provide can cope with the practical tests, I hope that there will be no danger of their falling foul of any penalties for overspending or colliding with the Department of the Environment when it comes to rate support grant provision.

In the long written answer of 12 November there emerged what the Government foresee happening in non-advanced further education. One important sentence reads:

"There are inevitable uncertainties about student numbers. The plans"—

these are the plans for non-advanced further education—

"assume some limited increase in the participation rate of 16 and 17-year-olds in future years."—[Official Report, 12 November 1984; Vol. 67, c. 56.]

Those two sentences highlight a growing problem for young people if they want to return to non-advanced education or go straight on to it from school. We have the complicated 21-hour rule and 12-hour study rule which determine whether a student will receive benefit.

The ability to be trained and retrained is essential to careers, and much depends on the lengths and levels of initial education attainment and access to continuous education and training after a person has left school. By altering the rules on benefit in a sensible cost-conscious way we can bring more young people back into the education system if they cannot get a job and ensure that they and the country benefit from the many excellent education facilities that we have. I am not advocating a blank cheque or vastly increased spending. I am suggesting that, in view of all the new courses in schools and the improvement in schools, especially in technical education, a growing number of young people will probably want to come back after school into education and benefit from it. It is incumbent upon us to ensure that student financial support is sensible and reasonable for those young people.

5.4 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): In the debate on the Gracious Speech last Tuesday the Prime Minister referred to the need to expand support for wealth-creating free enterprise rather than a wealth-consuming public sector. The Secretary of State's comments this afternoon have echoed that sentiment. It is important to recognise at the start of a debate on education that the public sector provides a major contribution to creating the nation's wealth and that an educated population's ability to provide economic success as well as social success is dependent on ensuring that we have the best standard of education that we can afford.

I suggest that the Secretary of State has not addressed himself this afternoon to whether we can get the best standard that we can afford. It seems that the Government are not prepared to afford as much as is necessary even to maintain standards, let alone improve them.

There is a good reason for considering ways of improving the quality of education and it is right that money is not the only answer, but parents, as well as teachers and children, are aware of the almost weekly reduction in standards and availability of support within our schools. The Government will pay a high price if they fail to recognise the strength of feeling among parents when they see a clear reduction in standards within schools that has a specific effect on their children.

Some interesting observations have been made on the discussions on teachers' pay and conditions. If we knew no different, we might think that the Secretary of State was engaged in a free-ranging discussion on teachers' pay and conditions with a view to making a fair and proper assessment of their role in society. However, we all know that constraints within the education budget allow for a total increase in the wage bill of only 3 per cent. With those constraints, it is not possible to have a proper discussion on what teachers' relative pay should be. Their pay should reflect their proper position in society when set against other forms of employment and our objective in ensuring that we have a motivated teaching profession. Secondly, their pay should reflect the work that they are expected to do. We are expecting them to cope with an increasing work load with rapidly changing curricula.

Mr. Powley: The hon. Gentleman is advancing a valid argument, but if the Government were able, within the constraints that he has mentioned, to allocate more resources to education, how would he devise a system whereby the extra resources were directed to the maintenance of school buildings and the provision of books and pencils, for example, and not to a higher proportion of the total allocation being taken in teachers' salaries?

Mr. Bruce: I would accept that argument if I were not aware that the Government have not afforded to education the protection that they have claimed to afford to the Health Service, for example. They are using opportunities within the education service to reduce the real commitment to education. That is where the difference lies between the Government's approach to education and other parts of the public sector. The majority of parents would resist and reject a declared reduction in overall and real funding in education, but that is what we are seeing. The Government quote statistics such as expenditure per pupil against the background of falling numbers and falling rolls, but they know, as do parents, that in individual schools class sizes are found frequently to be growing while available resources are frequently falling.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): It is necessary in this sort of debate to discuss the level of resourcing of the education service, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that the main issue should be whether the available money is being spent effectively and not so much the amount of money that should be spent?

Mr. Bruce: I agree with that. However, there has been an erosion of teachers' pay over the past few years, and it appears from what the Secretary of State has been saying that teachers can expect their real pay to be reduced still further in coming years. If that happens, we shall have a demoralised teaching profession. Teachers are already leaving their profession, and almost by definition it is the best who leave because they are the ones who receive the best offers outside the profession. The erosion of teachers' pay will discourage the right quality of person from entering the profession. I suggest that the erosion has occurred to such an extent that we are likely to suffer real damage in terms of the quality of teachers, because the Government have not yet conceded the need to take account of that fact.

Mr. Bernard Conlan (Gateshead, East): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bruce: I must continue. I do not have much time.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West) rose——

Mr. Bruce: I have given way twice. I want to make a number of points.

Mr. Conlan: I might help the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman might help me more by allowing me to develop my argument.

I have a thick file of letters that I have received from parents about the specific problems they are experiencing at all levels of education and about the cuts that are affecting them.

Mr. Conlan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bruce: If the alliance were allocated another speaker in this debate, I would be more than happy to give way. I should like to make the best use of my time and I must, therefore, continue.

I shall work through the main areas of education and show where the shortfall is taking place. I shall start with the youngest in our society. I cannot remember the exact quotation, but I believe that the Prime Minister, when Secretary of State for Education and Science, placed great store on the expansion of nursery education. Since the right hon. Lady became Prime Minister, however, there has been no such expansion. There has been a freezing, if not a contraction.

Mr. Dunn: The voluntary sector has expanded.

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman is suggesting that the voluntary side has expanded. That is the point that I was just about to make. Play groups and nursery schools are not the same, although they apply themselves to the same age group. Play groups have expanded rapidly. In the absence of alternative provision, play groups do a good job. I have had considerable contact with the play group movement, and I know that it is finding it increasingly difficult to accept responsibility in an area in which the Government do not accept responsibility. The operation of play groups is, properly, constrained by Government legislation. That constraint affects costs. The play groups have to run services, which must be paid for by parents. The play groups are effectively means-tested and the variation in charges is considerable. The cost per child can be extremely high in a community where there is a lack of accommodation and facilities. The position becomes extremely difficult for a parent with two pre-school age children, and those on low incomes may find it impossible. If the Government argue that the voluntary sector has expanded, they should show a little more willingness to help by reducing operating costs. I stress that I do not believe that play groups are a substitute for nursery schools; they are a complementary service.

Because of falling primary school rolls and Government constraints making local authorities reduce the number of teachers so as to get costs down, there is a definite loss of quality. There is a real cut in the availability of support teaching. There are increases in class sizes and more composite classes. Those aspects are observable. Parents are aware of them and do not like them. In the school attended by my son the provision of subjects such as art, physical education, music and drama has been cut in one blow, across the board, by 25 per cent. In some schools there has been a cut of 50 per cent. The cut means that, where there was one art period a week, there is now one a fortnight. If the art period falls on a holiday Monday, there is only one art period in the month. It is hardly worth the bother of having an art period—but I must not give the Under-Secretary of State ideas. I believe that most parents feel that the previous minimum is the least that they should expect. They are not impressed when the Government say that the expenditure cuts are not leading to real cuts in the educational provision. In my book, there is a real and perceptible cut, which parents rightly resist. Parents are filling my postbag with their complaints.

The position in secondary schools rightly gives most cause for concern. Although children suffer if their preparation in primary schools is not good, the prospects of those children who are caught in a bad time at secondary school are most at risk. The Secretary of State referred to changing teaching methods and changing curricula in secondary schools. Dedicated teachers are expected to provide more pupil-teacher contact, and most have responded to that need. Teachers are expected to undertake more preparation, yet often they must do so with fewer resources and less pay.

What is happening in Scotland should be of interest to the rest of the country, because we are pioneering the new secondary school curriculum. I assure the House that, although the net result is potentially exciting, the curriculum is worrying in practice. The implementation of the new curriculum involves each teacher and each school in preparing their own courses, producing the material for those courses and assessing substantially the quality of the work produced. That involves a massive amount of additional preparation work outside normal contractual time. Teachers are doing that willingly, but, as the Under-Secretary of State knows, some teachers feel that it is imposing an unacceptable burden. Regrettably, but perhaps understandably, some of those teachers are refusing to implement the new curriculum in the hope of forcing the Government to take some action on pay and conditions. I believe that all hon. Members think that such action is regrettable.

What can I or the Under-Secretary of State say when teachers state that the Government do not take notice of them when they are dedicated and get on with the job? The teachers say, "They just exploit us. They take advantage. How can we persuade the Government that we have a fair case if they consistently ignore us when we are reasonable?" The teachers have so far been extremely reasonable, because they value the parent-teacher relationship and know that industrial action in schools is damaging. I do not believe that any hon. Member would deny the fact that industrial action should be avoided at all costs. The Government should not exploit teachers shamelessly when they know that there is a real grievance that must be redressed.

It is not simply a matter of saying, "Give the teachers more money, and the job will be done." During the past week, I completed a tour of all the secondary schools in my constituency. Teachers are frustrated and angry. They say that giving more money would not solve the problem and that what they have been asked to do is virtually impossible. I have met teachers who have had to work through the night as well as on Saturdays and Sundays to get material ready. They have had to photocopy great quantities of material and to produce audio-visual material — yet there has been no increase in the resources budget. Not one penny more has been allocated.

It is hardly surprising that the whole situation could well come crashing down about the Government's ears. I regret the fact that there is no Minister from the Scottish Office present to listen to this debate. I would impress upon a Scottish Minister the fact that he must recognise that the position in Scotland requires an independent review body on teachers' pay. If such a review is not granted soon, the secondary school curriculum will fall apart around the Minister's ears. I am worried not about what will happen to the Minister but about what will happen to the children who will be caught in the consequences. I hope that the Secretary of State will take account of those children.

Teachers in Scotland are being asked, with no extra resources and no real evaluation, to introduce not only the new Munn and Dunning curriculum but the 10-to-14 action plan and the 16-to-18 action plan. Any reasonable Government must recognise that if they want teacher motivation and delivery of services, they must treat teachers differently.

I regret the fact that certain Conservative Members have sought to divide parents from teachers and to exploit a difficult situation. I suggest that those Conservative Members will not succeed. Teachers and parents must be on the same side — on the side of the children — to persuade the Government to provide the necessary resources. It is not helpful for chairmen of education committees to say that parents have been spoilt. It is not helpful for those chairmen to say, "In the past we have given parents too much, and they should be prepared to accept these cuts simply as a recognition of the fact that we have been far too generous in the past." Such statements are not helpful. They are even less helpful when they come from councillors and people in authority who are taking decisions and are not even sending their children to the schools that they administer. I feel that if they did—this is not just a cheap point—they might show more interest in what is going on in the schools they have opted out of.

Mr. Hind: The hon. Gentleman is talking about the Government driving a wedge between teachers and parents. Does he not feel that the positive moves that the Government have made to put teachers and parents side by side on governing bodies is completely contrary to what he has said, and is a clear sign of the Government's desire to unite parents and teachers in a partnership for the benefit of the pupils in the schools?

Mr. Bruce: I am not sure that I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I rather suspect that the Secretary of State's motivation was precisely the opposite, because it was an attempt to try to undermine respect for teachers.

Of course parents should be more involved in the running of schools, but the professional has also to be able to make professional decisions. I hope that the Secretary of State will produce a revised proposal that will take account of the fact that parents should be involved but that the professionals, nevertheless, should not be undermined. I accept the sincerity behind the question, but the object is to ensure that parents and teachers work collectively for the benefit of the children and, if necessary—I believe that it is necessary — collectively to show the Government their dissatisfaction with the lack of resources.

I am interested in special schools. Increasingly the ideal is to try as far as possible to integrate children from special schools into ordinary schools. One or two authorities have, perhaps mischievously, misconstrued that as a way of undermining special schools. The evidence suggests that the integration—which will require specially qualified staff and support—within the environment of the mixed ability and ordinary schools requires resources. That move is progressing relatively slowly.

I am interested in the teaching of the deaf as I have a deaf daughter. She is at the Aberdeen school for the deaf. There are one or two proposals that might have caused anxiety to those involved in teaching the deaf. The first is the report of the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers which suggests that the Government might consider not requiring a specialist qualification for teachers of the deaf in future. I should be grateful, and so would a great many other people who are involved, if the Minister could assure us that he had no intention of pursuing that recommendation, and that he recognises that teachers of the deaf need special qualifications, as they always have in the past, and that they should continue to have them.

Will the Minister also give more positive encouragement to introducing an opportunity for deaf people to teach deaf people? It is undesirable that all teachers of the deaf should be deaf, but it is also undesirable that those deaf people who have something to contribute should be excluded from the profession for what to some extent seem to be bureaucratic reasons. I believe that it would be a great advance if the Government could provide more positive encouragement for that.

Although this is a debate about schools and further education, it is true that many of the people going through our schools are looking forward to going into further education and universities. The measures that the Government have proposed include reduced grants and the abolition of the minimum grant. There is a suggestion that up to 11,000 students will have to pay a full-cost £520 contribution towards their fees. That is a burden that should not be imposed and one that is likely to fall unfairly on those students. The Government should not move further down that road, as they are effectively taking from many people the opportunity to benefit from the further education that they wish to enjoy.

While I and my colleagues appreciate that there is a genuine need to improve the quality of education, and to consider methods of improving it, that is rather subjective, and cannot be done by cutting resources. If the Government do not take seriously the representations that are made and the detailed information that they are receiving from their inspectorate — that real cuts in resources are having real and damaging effect on education, which will become worse over the next year or two if the Government's policies persist—the generation going through our schools today will live bitterly to regret the fact that they went through under this Thatcher Government. I and my colleagues will be voting with the Labour Opposition.

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): It is inevitable that the Inner London education authority should feature early as an example in any debate about value for money in education. Casting my mind back, I realise that I have been involved with inner London education in one way or another for more than 40 years.

Throughout that time, parents, teachers and ordinary people in the street have pleaded that the provision of education should be less political. I can understand what they mean by that. We recognise, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, that there is common ground between us — education is about providing the skills which allow a child to develop into an adult and to live a fulfilling and rewarding life. The difficulty in the past has been how that common ground can be achieved and by what policies. There have been political differences about policy. In inner London, as is inevitable all over the country, the education authority has been politically divided.

I wish to draw the attention of the House to a further aspect. Education in London has become more political over the past decade than ever before. The signs are that it will become more political still. In the 1960s and early 1970s many saw that an education authority was an implement for social engineering and social change. It could be done by the adaptation of the curriculum, by the programming of teachers along certain learning paths. Attitudes in society should be changed rather than giving learning skills to pupils.

That was a development which should be noted with some anxiety. Over the past few years, the politicising of education has gone a stage further. With the present administration of the ILEA there are one or two features at which we should look with greater care and anxiety. During the past few days ILEA's leadership has said that it feels that it has been misrepresented in the House. It is worth, therefore, identifying one or two points that we can see emerging.

I suggest tentatively that the present leadership of ILEA sees the ILEA as being not just an instrument for education or an implement for social change, but a weapon with which to conduct warfare against the Government on a front rather wider than education. The redeployment of resources has been the opportunity to join battle. We have seen evidence of it in the past months. One may ask how such a situation has come to pass. I suggest that there has been a systematic approach over a number of years. There has been an attempt to ensure that those elected on the Left of the Labour party are prepared to subscribe to the party's 39 articles of belief and to ensure that they do not step out of line and express any views contrary to that belief. That is perhaps something that we must accept as being part of the to and fro, the give and take of political life in the elective area. We can recognise it as an overt political division, and I do not make any harsh judgment on that basis.

We have seen, however, a change whereby the members of the authority have sought to see that the political divisions permeate to other levels. There is clear evidence over the past few years that many senior appointments in the administration have been made or at least coloured by the political persuasion of those who seek those appointments. Not only has this trend affected the officers of the authority, but it has been noticeable in the appointment of the governors who are political nominees. Political associations appoint some of the Labour governors on the various governing bodies of the schools. We have seen evidence that those associations have made it a requirement that those governors do not represent views that they hold personally, but should subscribe to and vote along lines that are put to them before the meetings take place. Therefore, there has been an opportunity to affect decisions and make sure that the attitudes of members of governing bodies and of the officers to some extent politically coincide.

But things have gone a stage further. Over the past few years, there has been a development in the appointment of head teachers. I have sat on head teacher panels in ILEA for several years. In the early days, there was a requirement to assess the candidates to see whether they were of the right educational calibre to give leadership and of the right administrative ability to preside over a whole round of activities, which the head of a school is required to do. However, today there have been clear signs from the questions that have been asked of an intention to probe the political attitudes of candidates. I am not saying that that is happening in every case, but it is happening in a significant number of cases. We should be alert to that factor and take such steps as may be necessary in due course.

We have seen that attitude in the appointment of head teachers and again in teacher training, where political attitudes are explicit in many courses of study. I should like to give an anecdotal example of a mature teacher who had been teaching for many years, and was very experienced, but who lacked the teacher qualification— the licence to preach — that would be necessary in future. Therefore, she sought an in-service training scheme that would allow her to get that qualification. She was among several other mature students on that course. They found it a salutary experience in one way that mature teachers were being instructed in the art of teaching by those who had little or no classroom experience. That was stimulating enough, but what stuck in their gullet, the point that annoyed them most and that they could not swallow, was the fact that the philosophy put forward in the course was so totally alien to their experience of what was right in the classroom, where there was a neutral political standpoint and an objective point of view. They were told that explicit political attitudes were right and proper. Mature students with classroom experience can assess the quality of what is being put before them and discard the dross, but those who do not have that experience, especially young teachers, are not so well able to judge, so the situation is more ambiguous and bewildering for them.

There is also evidence that in inner London the curriculum itself is being manipulated somewhat cynically towards political ends. Several courses might be seen as politically desirable at the Fabian summer school, but it is not appropriate to teach them to children in inner London, who need to gain the skills that will give them the opportunity to make their way in the world and earn their living in later life.

These things are happening concurrently and tend towards a certain end. That end has become apparent in recent weeks. It is apparent that ILEA is on a conflict course with the Government and the Secretary of State. One can see that these elements that I have sought to identify are now being mobilised. I received a letter the other day from a constituent who said:

"My son is a pupil at" a school in my constituency.

"Today I received a letter from the school, signed by the Headmaster"—

he names the headmaster—

"saying that the school will be closed on 7 November because members of the National Union of Teachers will be taking strike action as a protest against ILEA budget proposals and the imposition of Rate Capping on the Authority's finances."

Such an approach is an abuse of a head teacher's position. It is an abuse of an authority's position. It should not use children as the emissaries of such a political message. There is an important issue here, but it should not be fought in the classroom. Such approaches are entirely reprehensible. My correspondent continues:

"The letter goes on to request parents to register their views with their Members of Parliament."

That is why my constituent wrote to me. He adds:

"May I assure you of my wholehearted support for the Government's action in bringing this spendthrift authority back to reality . . . ILEA must be prevented from squandering any more millions of pounds of ratepayers' money. As a Southwark ratepayer I feel doubly penalised."

Interestingly enough, in this case the approach was counter-productive, but few parents have the courage to write such a letter in the face of authority. Few parents who thought that would dare say it. Few governors who felt that could say it in open meetings where they are in a minority. There are some sinister elements that should be identified and brought out into the open if we are discussing whether ILEA has a good case for being rate capped, for redeploying its resources or being considered special. The present administration of ILEA is not presenting a good case. In fact, it is letting down the children of inner London.

To end on a more optimistic note, I congratulate the Secretary of State on making sure that the ILEA of the future remains a unitary body serving deprived areas of inner London as well as more prosperous areas, and at the same time ensuring that it is a directly elected and democratically sensitive body that can recognise educational need in inner London and make an assessment of the proper price that should be paid in achieving the standards that we require.

5.37 pm

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): I do not want to follow the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) down that avenue, except to say that, as a former education administrator, I always look to the professionals of ILEA as examples of the height of professionalism and as representing all that is truly progressive in the education service. The hon. Gentleman's description of what is going on in ILEA was not credible, but he knows his own area best.

I shall confine most of my remarks to non-advanced further education. The education service resents some of the messages that come from Conservative Members—although not from the Secretary of State—who denigrate all those who serve in the public service. It has become almost a dirty word to many Conservative Members to say that one works in the public sector. It is as if everyone who worked in the public sector was an inferior animal who would be working in the private sector if only he could get a proper job.

I have worked in the public, private and voluntary sectors. The level of dedication in the public sector is at least the equal of that in the private sector, where the rewards and the perks of the job are so much greater. I should like to put on record the Opposition's appreciation of the dedication of teachers, administrators, cleaners, caretakers and dinner ladies to the state education service.

I wish that Conservative Members understood how much their ill-thought-out statements about the public service affect the morale of those who work in it. There is a crisis of morale in the teaching profession, and the Secretary of State would do well to address himself to it. I was glad to hear him recognise the difficulty of the teachers' task, because it is not widely recognised. We should all say how extremely difficult it is to teach today when many of the old models of authority have been broken. Many teachers wrestle with problems which their predecessors of 30 or 40 years ago would not have recognised or been able to cope with. We should all support the teachers, who are trying to contend with the many social problems which society is throwing up. Parents are often unable to deal with them, as are the social services. All too often such problems fall to be dealt with by teachers, heads of department or head teachers.

Some people like to pretend that all teachers live in a cloistered atmosphere and are unaware of and uninterested in the problems of the real world, but many people in further education have worked in industry and commerce and are only too familiar with their problems. That sector of the education service is at the interface between education and training and industry and commerce. It is difficult to cope at that interface.

In the past few years further education has had to wrestle with the repercussions of the collapse of manufacturing industry. That collapse has devastated large parts of the country, especially County Durham. My hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) and I are all too familiar with the devastation that has resulted from the destruction of jobs in the area. It has been difficult to sustain the education service in those circumstances. The involvement of employers in training has often collapsed even faster than industry. Further education has had to find students and then contend with the impact of advanced technology. Some hon. Members are more or less experts on the repercussions of advanced technology, but most of us are unaware of them, especially in education and training. The uncertainties of advanced technology have to be coped with daily.

I remind the Secretary of State that the education and training part of the education service is at the sharp end of our problems over competitiveness. It can be argued that the further education service has a greater contribution to make to the country's competitiveness, to our ability to handle the impact of advanced technology and to cope with the social and economic changes that are riding roughshod over many parts of the country. People who provide further education and training must therefore not be ignored or denigrated. They do not live in a cloistered atmosphere. They have always had to draw their students from industry and commerce and have had to prove to industry that their courses are relevant and that the quality of their teaching is high.

Mrs. Angela Rumbold (Mitcham and Morden): I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said and agree with much of it. Does he agree that the Department of Environment's initiative is absolutely right, as it ensures that people in colleges of further education have the full benefit of working in concert with employers and that they, with money provided by the Manpower Services Commission, will supply the very technology and information that people in colleges need?

Mr. Foster: I do not entirely agree with the hon. Lady. I was about to consider that matter, so, if she will bear with me, I might be able to agree with some of what she said.

We face a great problem over how to implement change in the education service. Every Secretary of State for Education and Science has wrestled with the problem of getting people in the education service to agree a plan of action and then to achieve a set of objectives. It is understandable that Secretaries of State want more power to achieve change, but decision making in the education service is diffuse. We have to persuade local education authorities, colleges, heads of department, boards of governors, perhaps academic boards and teachers, that what we have decided is best.

Many people in the education service long to impose change. We are impatient for it, as it never goes as fast as we should like. Politicians might have only a short run. The Secretary of State has been with us for a long time —some might say too long—and he might continue in office for some time yet. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] At least he has the support of his Back Benchers. He has been fortunate in that he has been able to pursue a course of action and see it through. What puzzles me is that he has not chosen to take on the authorities or to change the constitutional arrangements by which education is administered. Rather he has chosen to stand on one side. The Secretary of State has chosen to turn a blind eye while the further education service has been raped by the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Foster: Perhaps at some other time we may discuss the implications of rape in relation to the MSC.

Where was the Secretary of State when the decision was made to take a quarter of the further education service from the local education authorities? What part did he play in those discussions? Did he feel that he was doing education a service when he allowed that to happen? Did he not owe it to the education service to stand up for it and fight in its corner? How will he be able to deliver the good will of the education service — of the local education authorities, the colleges, the principals and the heads of department — when he stands on one side and allows them to be dealt with in that way by the MSC?

Sir Keith Joseph: Because I take the view that non-advanced further education, like most other aspects of education, is patchy—it varies from the excellent to the not-so-excellent — I assume that the interests of local education authorities, principals and lecturers are not always the same as the interests of students, and my interest is the students' interest.

Mr. Foster: I accept that explanation from the Secretary of State. He sweeps aside the dedication of those involved in further education—the principals, lecturers and departmental heads.

Sir Keith Joseph indicated dissent.

Mr. Foster: The Secretary of State says that his interest in the students is better informed and more dedicated than that of those involved in further education.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Perhaps my hon. Friend can find out whether the Secretary of State now accepts the compromise. Also, why does the Secretary of State feel that students can influence the MSC and so improve the quality of their courses, although there is no real democratic accountability, but that they cannot influence the local education authorities through the locally elected councils?

Mr. Foster: That is a point that I wished to make. Any Secretary of State must want more power to implement change, but to stand on one side and give that power to the MSC, whose structure is unresponsive and insensitive to the forces that have to be persuaded to implement any changes, is not the way to use that power. The Secretary of State may achieve his aims in the short term, but only at the expense of upsetting all those forces within education which he must reconcile to his ideas.

I deal now with the point raised by the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold). I have never regarded the MSC as the big black beast which must be resisted at all costs. I welcome the money from the MSC for the youth opportunities programme, because that money can be used as a lever for change within education. I take the same view with regard to the rest of work-related non-advanced education. By all means let us use the money from the MSC as a lever for change, but the Secretary of State for Education should not stand on one side, wash his hands of the matter and say that it is nothing to do with him and that the MSC is in a better position to influence the situation and is better equipped to deal with educational institutions.

Does the Secretary of State accept the compromise being worked out between the education authorities and the MSC under its new chairman? Would he like to tell us whether, in his view, the arrangement is satisfactory?

Sir Keith Joseph indicated dissent.

Mr. Foster: The Secretary of State does not wish to tell us at present. I do not regard the MSC as a malevolent influence within the system. Money from the MSC should enable us to implement work-related schemes which will be relevant and responsive to the needs of industry and commerce. However, the MSC is acting in a most insensitive way — a way almost calculated to cause uncertainty and disruption within education. The Secretary of State will regret his abrogation of his responsibility in that respect.

The Secretary of State must wrestle with the problem of the necessity to provide a variety of support for young people in the 16 to 19 age group. Some young people are in receipt of unemployment benefit, some get an allowance from the youth training scheme, some are able to use the 21-hour rule, some receive a meagre educational maintenance allowance from the local education authority and some get nothing at all.

There is a great opportunity here. The problem of youth unemployment is horrifying. I have been highly critical of the attitude of the Department of Education and Science to the youth training scheme, and I believe that the Secretary of State himself should have played a much greater part in the discussions.

We can deal with the problem in a constructive way, or we can miss the opportunity to do so. I believe that many of those who gain nothing from school could, between the ages of 16 and 19, be motivated by the youth training scheme to understand the value of education and training. However, the Secretary of State must realise that many young people are dissuaded from staying on at school or embarking on further education because they receive no income support. I am thinking in particular of children from very poor working-class families. That is a great waste.

We must not pretend that the YTS is the best way of catering for the needs of all those students. Very often, it would be better for them to stay on at school or go on to further education. We must find some way of giving those students and their families an incentive to pursue what is for them by far the better course. I would not denigrate the YTS in any way, although it needs to be improved. However, a substantial proportion of young people would be better advised to stay on at school or go on to full-time further education. The Secretary of State ignores the fact that many children from poor families cannot afford to do so.

The Labour party is committed to a comprehensive scheme, lasting at least two years, in which the YTS will be part of an integrated system of further education and training. Staying on at school and in further education will be part of the integrated scheme. Youngsters can enter the youth training scheme, then go back into the education system, and then perhaps proceed to another aspect of education and training during the two-year period. I admit that the scheme would be expensive, but we must work out a way of persuading those for whom it would be best to stay at school or to proceed to full-time further education.

There is a great divide in the House, especially between the Conservative party and the Labour party, about the society that we want. We cannot pretend that politics has no part in education. Politics will always be an integral part of discussions about education, because we are talking about resources and how they should be allocated, how many students should continue in full-time education and what that full-time education should be.

The Secretary of State must understand that he cannot cry for an improvement in standards across the board and then talk as though resources were irrelevant. I recognise that we need more than more resources if we are to improve standards in schools and in further education, but to talk as though resources are irrelevant to that objective is to deceive the electorate. We cannot deliver better standards in education without adequate resources, and in failing to stand up for the education service at Cabinet meetings, and in offering cuts time after time, the Secretary of State has let down the education service and an entire generation of students. If we cannot afford to invest in our young people, we do not believe in the values which we say we uphold.

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): As I listened to the final comments of the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster), I thought that I would be able to agree with what he said. However, I cannot accept his criticism of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The hon. Gentleman will find much agreement for his statement that resources are not irrelevant to the achievement of excellence. The divide between the parties to which he referred does not mean that those of us who believe that resources should be used more efficiently also believe that there is merit in restricting resources. We are aware that, in education as in many other public services, more money could be used wisely and well. However, we are not always certain that the extra money would be used wisely and well.

If we had extra resources for education we might follow the example of our cousins across the Atlantic. In the state of Florida, whose economy is beginning to expand, from September of this year the junior high and high schools will have an extra period in each day's schooling—three quarters of an hour extra schooling. That is a recognition of the fact that there can be a desire for more education, not simply better education within given parameters. In California—another state that has benefited from the growth of the American economy—in September of this year the college semester began a week early. Each semester will be a week longer, which is again a recognition that, in some cases, more education is desirable and can be better.

However, we must remember that in Florida parents pay for the writing materials, stationery and art materials that their children take to school. There is a different participation by parents in Florida in paying the costs of education, and, a much higher proportion of fees is paid by parents and students than happens in Britain. Even if resources were widely available, we would have to examine closely how those increased resources were allocated to ensure that we got the best value.

I shall confine my remarks to the allocation of resources. When it has been debated in the past, it has tended to mean the allocation of resources between those who are directly concerned with teaching in the classroom and those outside. That is an important factor. Even after all that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and other Ministers have done, about half of those paid out of the education budget today will never face a classroom full of pupils. There is room for redeployment of resources in the education budget away from those who are not directly concerned with education and towards those who are.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will accept that resources could be better deployed in schools. I was a teacher for many years, and then a head teacher, and I know that a problem in many schools is the growing burden of administrative duties that are carried out by skilled teachers. I hope that we can reverse that trend, because the best teacher—who often obtains promotion to head of department or head teacher because of his skills in the classroom—is not always the best administrator.

We have already heard this afternoon about the current review of teachers' pay and conditions. One of the most revolutionary and desirable changes that could be made would be to offer a system whereby the excellent teacher was rewarded as a career teacher in the classroom, not by being given an administrative post or by a reduction of his time in the classroom.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House visit schools regularly, and are often shown young pupils doing remarkable work with computers, which I welcome wholeheartedly. However, it is odd that only a few of the schools that have excellent computer programmes for pupils as aids to learning and as training for future careers use computers for their administration. Most schools keep their records on pieces of paper or cardboard in filing cabinets. If the information was recorded electronically so that it could be brought back instantly, it would save an enormous amount of time and effort by teachers who are asked to fill in returns and to make lists of pupils.

There is no need for records to be kept in schools, although that happens all too often. If schools had terminals from a mainframe computer at the education office, it would be unnecessary to ask head teachers to send lists of pupils who met certain criteria, because that information would be available at the touch of a button. The school would not be bothered with such administrative tasks, which all too often fill the time of the most skilled teachers, who would be far better employed teaching in the classroom.

I make it clear that I am not suggesting that education is no more than teaching in the classroom. I recognise that the education budget has to cover a great deal more than that. It has to cover the costs of administration, of building and of providing equipment. I am not belittling these needs. However, one way in which we might achieve the excellence in education that is the object of both sides of the House would be to ensure that the very best teachers were rewarded so that they continued to make their contribution in the classroom during their careers rather than being diverted into an administrative role. If we could achieve that, and ensure that our best pupils were taught by our best teachers, we should also achieve excellence.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: The hon. Gentleman is talking about rewards. From where will the money come?

Mr. Griffiths: I have said that I would like to see increased resources as and when they are available, and out of that I should like to see increased rewards for the best teachers. At the moment, the allocation of funds for salaries is geared to the ability of the nation to pay, as is recognised by the Department of Education and Science, which knows what the allocation is likely to be. I should like teachers to be rewarded within the present totality of salaries for excellence in teaching rather than being promoted into jobs that require them to devote their time to administration. Within the totality of existing salaries, more money going to the best teachers rather than to administrators would be helpful, and as and when greater resources become available I am sure that the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) and I would wish more resources to be devoted to this.

I agree with much that is implied in the Opposition's motion, but they are taking too narrow and too limited a view. It is necessary for us to recognise that only a small increase in excellence in education can be achieved by increases in resources. What is needed is careful thought and management of the resources, on whatever level they may be provided.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): I shall take up several of the points made by the Secretary of State. This is one of the rare occasions when hon. Members who would like to do so can take him on about some of the statements that he regularly makes from the Dispatch Box when he tries to fool the House into believing that expenditure in education is for ever expanding. The only person that the Secretary of State is fooling is himself. Educationists and chief education officers, wherever they are, say that things are getting not better, but worse.

In some authorities, the shortage of the basic resources of education such as books is so critical that teachers have been breaking the law by using machinery illegally to photostat textbooks so that the children can complete courses. This is so serious that writs have been issued against certain local authorities. The teachers are merely attempting to cope with the savage cuts that have been experienced, not only in their salaries but in necessary requirements such as books. The hon. Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) talked about an extra computer for the school secretary to help with administration. However, in education the need is far more basic than that.

Often, the Secretary of State is tempted to play the numbers game when he talks about pupil-teacher ratios. I shall point out one or two anomalies that show that things are not as simple as the Secretary of State would have the House believe. It is true that there are falling rolls, but it is not simple to match schools with falling rolls to the number of teachers. For example, one cannot say that numbers in a primary school are so low that the school will be closed and the pupils will be concentrated in another primary school four miles away. In many instances, although such a solution may be economic, it will be difficult to close the original primary school because mothers have very young children who cannot travel long distances. For that reason, uneconomic schools may need to be kept open.

The Secretary of State attempts to fool the House with his numbers game, but his theories do not hold water. He should stop playing the game, because it is far from being as honest as we should expect of him. If the Secretary of State wishes confirmation of this theory, I suggest that he initiates an investigation into the problem of schools with falling rolls and trying to staff them with teachers, when schools already have so many problems.

With great pride, the Secretary of State quoted savings from school meals. This is a vexed problem for many local authorities. Making savings in school meals means that local authorities are serving junk food menus, which are no longer nutritional and do not provide a balanced diet for the children. Some authorities, including mine, have high incidences of poverty and in many cases the midday meal at school is the only main meal that the child will have. For this reason, educationists believe that it is essential that a child should have a balanced diet at school. It is not good enough to say that the kids can be provided with food at home so that at lunch time they can have merely a sausage roll or a cheese bun. That is not giving them an adequate meal, even though savings may be made.

I remember that some years ago, under a previous Conservative Government, the Prime Minister was the Secretary of State for Education and Science. She had the idea of stopping school milk. My authority was outraged and up in arms about this, because it recognised that school milk was essential and was good for the development of the child, and even good for education. The local authority on that occasion countermanded the order. Instead of breaking the law, we introduced free soup. However, the then Conservative Government were not satisfied and tried to introduce regulations to deny the children their free soup. Talk about cuts being made in the cost of school meals is nothing new. Such efforts to cut costs are a constant nag, because education has become a whipping boy and millions of pounds are always being lopped off its budget.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): The position is even worse than my hon. Friend describes. If a child is given a cheese sandwich, there is at least some nutritional value in it. The cheese contains calories and there are carbohydrates in the bread. But in many schools that I have visited children now go for chips with curry sauce. Some sort of soup is poured over the chips. I really cannot see the nutritional value in such food. Incidentally such a meal costs 50p.—for chips with some sort of soupy, curry-like liquid on them. That is what children are having today.

Mr. Eastham: What my hon. Friend says typifies the true position. Our children are now being served junk food in schools, which cannot be in the interests of good education.

Mr. Dunn: I have been listening with interest to the hon. Gentleman, who talks about the city of Manchester, an area which I know well. I am curious to know why he thinks that the Labour Government, who succeeded the Conservative Government of 1970-74, did not reintroduce the provision of milk in schools.

Mr. Eastham: The Minister does not know Manchester as well as I do. I have lived in Manchester all my life, other than during my national service. When we had the reorganisation of local government in 1974, the Labour-controlled Greater Manchester county council had a licence to spend 2p. Hon. Members will remember that there was a licence for a local authority to spend a certain amount of money. It was decided to spend that money to allow the 10 districts to provide milk. It was done because there were two local authorities that were not Labour but Conservative. The Labour Government told local authorities that they could now supply free milk if they wished to do so. However, the two Conservative authorities in the Greater Manchester area had no intention of reintroducing the provision of milk. As a result the Greater Manchester county council—the upper tier for the 10 authorities—said that it would provide it. Those are the true facts about the provision of school milk.

We talk a great deal about examination results. They are an issue very dear to the Labour party. But it is not unreasonable to point out that many factors are involved in getting good examination results. Children have to live in decent homes. They do not do very well when they live in terrible slums. We have many problems in the inner city areas, where the Government are doing next to nothing to improve housing conditions. If a child has homework to do, it is essential that he goes to a decent home, possibly with central heating, and to a room where he can study.

I realise that the majority of Government supporters do not come from poor homes. They do not appreciate what it is like to live in a slum and consequently they do not understand the importance of other amenities in addition to classrooms. Bad housing is another reason why children in our inner city areas do not achieve very good examination results.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Just now I heard a Government supporter ask about Liverpool. Will my hon. Friend comment on the worth of providing a temporary flower garden, which is about all that this Government have done for Liverpool, when set against the real poverty of opportunity for children in the north-west generally and the real poverty of the backgrounds of these children? However valuable a flower garden might be, it does not solve these problems.

Mr. Eastham: I would never refuse anything from this Government. If they want to provide a few flower gardens, at least they will make life a little more tolerable. However, I do not think that Government supporters should imagine that they will make a devastating contribution to an improvement in standards of education.

We have had numerous reports on education—the Newsom report, the Plowden report and the Robbins report. All of them made one basic point. All of them recognised the need to spend money. Until the Government are honest enough to say that it is necessary to provide money, we shall never achieve the standards of education that the House wants to provide.

There is no shortage of resources in private education. I remember watching a television programme a couple of years ago about some of the posh, fee-paying schools. It was said with a certain amount of pride that even the rowing equipment was worth £250,000. In some of our schools we cannot even afford textbooks. That underlines the dishonesty of the Government. They know these facts but they try to cheek their way through and convince people that they really care. We know that they do not care. Actions are better than words, and we are not getting the necessary resources.

Education is always the whipping boy of Conservative Governments, and no longer does education have its rightful place among the professions. It does not have the prestige to which it is entitled. We have this constant haggling every time the teachers as a profession make representations for decent pay. As time goes on we shall get what we pay for, so we shall have low morale among our teachers and, as a consequence, we shall have steadily reducing standards of education.

In this debate we are discussing two sections—schools and further education—and there is one major problem about our schools which was touched on by one of my hon. Friends earlier today. It refers to maintenance grants and the unequal subsidies. There is a great deal of confusion in all local authorities. In massaging the unemployment figures the Government have decided to spend money on the Manpower Services Commission, and grants are to be paid to young people under its scheme. There are other education answers such as discretionary grants, which the Government tell local authorities they may give if they wish. But if they do they get into difficulties with the Treasury, which says that they are spending too much money. What is more, very often the grants are means-tested, which causes further problems.

Local authorities should not be penalised if they wish to give grants to encourage young people to stay on at school. Sometimes, obviously, school leavers will benefit by staying on in education, but some can do so only if there is some financial benefit for them. Instead, they say to themselves that if they go on the dole they will get unemployment pay so they may as well stay in bed and collect money for doing so. That is no use to anyone. It is of no benefit to the young people concerned and it is of no benefit to the country's future. Other children stay on but their parents receive virtually no assistance. If the Government genuinely wish to give equal opportunities to children, that aspect should be cleared up.

The Secretary of State periodically announces that he intends to impose a curriculum but local authorities are given no clear idea of what is in his mind so they do not know where they are going.

I hope that the Government will also give us some answers about the effect of falling rolls on parental freedom of choice. There is no easy solution. Popular schools are filled to overflowing while pupils rattle against the sides of the other schools. It is time that the Department suggested some logical solution.

The word "privatisation" is constantly wafting around and it seems that there may be some more of it in the offing for education. This naturally causes restlessness in the work force. Staff are entitled to be treated with respect. They are not parasites. Many education authority workers providing school meals and other services do a first-class job, although they are often underpaid. They are entitled to security and to some idea of where they are going. It is all very well to talk about parents' rights, but it should be remembered that teachers and other staff are often parents as well.

In further education there was great resentment when it was discovered that the new money for Manpower Services Commission training was being taken away from education. I remember being told by the Minister that £60 million was being transferred. That was not new money. It was just a bookkeeping exercise, taking money from further education and slinging it into the Manpower Services Commission in an attempt to kid people that the Government were spending more money. There was quite an eruption over this and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities made it clear to the Government that there would be no co-operation. We are now told that there is to be some kind of peace formula. If that is so, may we take it that the Government intend to bring back some kind of sanity into spending in these areas?

The special problems of the polytechnics have not so far been raised in the debate. It is time that the Government applied themselves to problems such as capital allocation. Polytechnics suffer the annual problem of having to replace obsolete equipment. High technology equipment such as computers is very expensive. It is a matter not of a couple of hundred pounds but of several thousands of pounds. If they are to train students for industry they must keep abreast of technical developments, but they are falling far behind in the attempt to kit themselves out with the necessary equipment.

On the subject of training in education, even the Government must admit that not all educationists agree with the Government's new theory that education authorities should be training students for specific jobs. Many of them believe that their business is to provide education for the child's entire future. People tend to change jobs three times in their lifetime, so it is more important to provide a broad education. Moreover, specific requirements are constantly changing. The Select Committee on Employment recently took evidence from industrialists and we found that many of them did not really know what they wanted. For instance, five or six years ago there was a shortage of production management engineers. In the four or five years necessary to produce the necessary specialists, however, developments in robotics meant that many of those trained people were not required. Therefore, we should not be fooled into rushing to provide everything that industrialists say that they need. We should be developing talent so that people can adapt to the changing needs of industry.

The purpose of today's debate is to impress on the Government that excellence in education cannot be achieved on the cheap. Education is an investment for the future and it is vital for this country's survival into the next century.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I have no hesitation in supporting the Prime Minister's amendment. For the first time, we have a Secretary of State who has turned his attention to the 40 per cent. of school leavers who, in his own words,

"after 11 years of compulsory schooling, show no apparent benefit from having been at school."

He has also said that to do something about this

"The keys are effective teachers and motivated pupils", that

"Teaching effectively is a hard job"

—I entirely agree—and that the Government's first job was to raise the quality of teachers.

That is not best achieved by talking of teachers as commodities in a supply and demand situation. As a former teacher, I know that teaching is very much a vocation. There are very few professions of that kind in which the ruling system is that of supply and demand. With falling school rolls, the profession is contracting. Pay is also part of that. There have been enormous fluctuations in pay increases for teachers in the past 10 years or so. This has led to an uncharacteristic militancy on the part of teachers, for whom money has traditionally been a secondary consideration. The Secretary of State, employers and teachers all want to succeed in finding a new structure for future pay arrangements.

The hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) spoke wisely on a number of issues. We should all remember that education administrators, and indeed councillors in local education authorities, have a unique propensity for causing deep gloom among teachers, parents and pupils, often to the detriment of their children's education. That is often not intentional, but, perceived from a teacher's point of view, it can be very damping.

The hon. Gentleman pointed out that all the problems of society tend to end up on teachers' plates. That is often true. That is why much more community support is necessary for our schools and teachers. I speak with feeling as a former parent-teachers' association chairman and a former elected parent-governor, but that works both ways, and increased specialisation by teachers, including at primary level, can lead to a freezing out of parents from the educational process — a weakening of that partnership between parents and teachers.

[Mr. Robert Key]

I was in the United States recently looking at education and I was impressed by the fact that the teaching profession there seems to be less jealous and more welcoming of parents into classrooms and the education process. We should bear that in mind.

I congratulate the Secretary of State on his commitment to a change from a relative examination system far nearer to an absolute system in which young people will in future be tested not on how they compare with other young people, but on what they understand, know and can do. Many teachers welcome the concept of criteria-related grades. That step will improve motivation, among both teachers and pupils. Pupils will be tested according to their potential.

The amendment speaks of

"securing the most effective use of the substantial resources available for the benefit of the education service."

Those substantial resources are provided not just for the benefit of the education service but for the benefit of the community, and there is one aspect of that which we neglect at our peril.

I want to concentrate on the need for our young people to be made much more fully aware of the dangers of substance abuse. Today, my regional health authority is considering a report which it commissioned on the rising tide of drug abuse. Like many other hon. Members, I have discussed that matter with local police, the local education authority and the district health authority. In common with everybody else, my education authority has a curriculum for social and personal education in its schools and within that there is a unit on community responsibility for drugs, including alcohol and tobacco. I stress the words "community responsibility" because that is how we should be tackling the problem, particularly in schools. However, my education authority confines that curriculum to the fourth and fifth years, and I am not convinced that that is adequate.

There seems to be agreement that because of trends in the availability and price of marijuana and cocaine, because there are doubts about the efficiency of the voluntary code for retail sales of solvents such as glue and butane, and because there is no sign of a downturn in the consumption of alcohol, its social acceptability and its use and misuse, we probably have about two years before we shall have to face major problems of chemical dependency among our young people.

I welcome the Government's initiative on drug abuse and the work of the ministerial committee responsible for co-ordinating Government action in that area, but are my right hon. Friend and his Department represented on that committee? The Government must take a long-term and broad view and the solution of the problems of substance abuse must start with education.

I had so many questions in my mind about the issue of substance abuse that I went to California last month with the prime purpose of examining prevention and rehabilitation projects. I found that some 60 per cent. of high school children have had experience of marijuana or cocaine, or both. There is no easy transfer of solutions. It cannot even be said that a similar situation will arise here, but we ignore California's experience and conclusions at our peril.

It is often said that to talk about drugs and substance abuse in schools encourages experimentation and their use and abuse among young people. The best evidence suggests that that is not so. When perhaps it is so, it is the result of general comment in general studies in schools, probably by a teacher with the best of intentions who is not supported by a rigorous curriculum in the school or education authority. There is also a body of evidence which suggests that education on alcohol, drugs, tobacco and solvents should begin when a child is as young as eight years old. Later, it may be too late.

Two of the most experienced teams in the United States have produced programmes which I commend to my right hon. Friend. Many San Francisco schools have widely adopted a sophisticated model chemical policy which is designed to institute clear chemical abuse prevention programmes within their schools. It stresses the inter-relation of student, family and community and the importance of teacher training.

The Centre for Human Development in Lafayette, California, has developed a programme which has been widely used and proven throughout schools in the United States. It involves a mutual support network for teenagers with alcohol and drug problems, known as NEAT family groups. NEAT stands for "new experience in affection and trust". That is an untranslatable Californian expression of the need for young people to become more confident in their ability to succeed in school, in their relationships and in life in general.

The Department of Education and Science is to be congratulated on the careful advice that it has given to local education authorities on drugs and drug-related problems, but the time has come when we can no longer rely exclusively on circulars from Elizabeth house to prevent the waste of human resources—people—and the family tragedies which result from all forms of chemical substance abuse, whether we are talking of tobacco, alcohol, solvents or drugs.

I draw two conclusions. First, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his Department should play a full part in the co-ordination of the Government's drug abuse policy. Secondly, education authorities should take a lead in establishing community-based school-centred groups to act on local problems. The local education authority is too big a unit. The problems of Swindon are different from those of Salisbury, and those of Trowbridge are different from those of Amesbury. The headmaster of the Stonehenge comprehensive school in Amesbury told me on Monday of problems there relating to the Stonehenge festival, the spectacle of drug availability and the wholesale disregard for the law which inevitably goes right through into the school and community.

If such community-based groups could be established, membership should undoubtedly include not only teachers and parents, but doctors, police, social workers and local churchmen. As I am sure hon. Members will agree, substance abuse occurs among schoolchildren, but often after school hours and off school premises. It is a community phenomenon.

It is still true that prevention is better than cure. Cure and rehabilitation is another area of great deficiency in Britain, but it would be inappropriate for me to talk about that now. We cannot afford to be complacent about substance abuse in our schools. Many problems face education, but that is one which we can prevent from becoming worse while the situation is under control. For once we can avoid lurching into management by crisis of a major social threat if we all have the will to act now.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), which dwelt on a very serious problem. I had great sympathy with almost all of his speech. However, he also said that he would congratulate the Department of Education and Science and I cannot go along with him on that. Although it may perceive the problem, it has not done enough about it. It is one thing to send out circulars saying that something should be done about glue sniffing, but there are also possibilities for action. Legislation could be introduced making it impossible for young children to buy glues and various chemicals. Certainly more could be done in that way.

I urge the Department to look again at the problem. After all, it is a serious problem and has existed for 50 or 60 years in the United States. I believe that in large measure it arises because of the uncertain future facing many young American children. That problem is now coming home to roost in Britain. One cause—although perhaps not the major cause—may be that children go to school, not because they will eventually go on to higher education or vocational training, or because they will then obtain jobs, but simply because there is nowhere else to go. Their parents want to get rid of them between 9 am and 4 pm. When they finish school, they will have no future and will be thrown on to the scrap-heap.

There are various schemes, such as the youth training scheme, which are intended to give children the impression that there is a future, but children are not that daft. They know that the schemes last for a year and that after that they have to find a job. But they cannot find jobs and they know what their older peers are doing. Consequently, there is a lowering of morale. Children do not know what to do, and that is one of the factors that make many of them go to places in which they can sniff glue and other substances.

Although that is an important subject, I want to talk about higher education and the curricula——

Mr. Hind: If the hon. Gentleman had been in the Chamber from the beginning of the debate, instead of being wheeled in to waste our time, he would know that the debate is about schools and further education.

Dr. Marek: Higher education is contained in further education.

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): Perhaps I can assist the hon. Gentleman. Although the debate is on further education in schools, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State dwelt, without apology and at length, on the grant cuts that have arisen from the autumn statement. Many of us would like the opportunity of speaking on that subject as well.

Dr. Marek: I think that this is a wide-ranging debate. I have read the motion and the amendment, and I think that I am in order. I hope that Conservative Members will make interventions, but that they will be interventions of substance and of logical argument and that they will not raise mere peccadilloes as to whether one is using the right terminology.

I shall concentrate on what happens to schoolchildren and on what is taught in schools and in courses of higher education. I was a lecturer at the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, for nearly 20 years and, although I have not seen the report, I have it on good authority that this year the principal of that college said that some students do not now find places and that the situation is the worst since the last war. I stress that a principal and an eminently respected figure in the community has said that the situation is the worst since the last war.

It is not good enough for Conservative Members to give facile excuses about the problem being simply a question of a little more efficiency or economy, and I do not expect them to say that if only students were shunted from one institution to another everything would be all right, or that students numbers have increased, and so on. That principal understands the position, and he says that the situation in his university college is the worst since the last war.

There was a time when universities had quinquennial planning and were able to plan five years in advance. Such systems are efficient. If institutions, colleges and schools know what their resources are to be, they can plan for their starting numbers. They can also make projections about students numbers and plan efficiently. To be fair, the previous Labour Government must to a certain extent take responsibility, but what happened then is as nothing compared with what is happening now under a Conservative Government.

The rate support grant figures are often changed, and consequently local authorities are under pressure because they do not know from one year to the next what their financial obligations will be, or how much money they will have at their disposal in order to provide for the education services in their areas.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): My hon. Friend will be well aware that a bombshell has fallen on another section of further education and training with the announcement that the information technology centres' programme, which was supposed to be the jewel in the crown of the new training system, is to be cut. The Department of Trade and Industry will not top it up after this year. That is a cruel blow to what was supposed to be the jewel in the crown of a new sort of training for young people.

Dr. Marek: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that valid point. It might be carrying it too far to say that the Government should be interested in education above everything else, but they should see education as a vital and necessary function of government if they are to provide for succeeding generations. Unfortunately, the Government put their medium-term financial strategy at the top of the list and are concerned with reducing public borrowing as far as possible. They do not like public expenditure, and it does not matter one whit whether generation after generation of schoolchildren are ruined, because the Government are not interested in that They are concerned only with reducing public expenditure or the public sector borrowing requirement to, say, 1 per cent. of gross domestic product by some future date. That is a great pity.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that the summation of the situation is that if the state has to provide it will cut that provision back to the minimum? The Government seem to believe in the policy that if one can afford it one can have it, and that if one cannot afford it one will not get it.

Dr. Marek: My hon. Friend is quite right. One has only to look at the figures for assisted places and private education to see that that point is proved. The Government are against public expenditure. The Department has even produced various figures for students entering colleges and universities, but they are quite unrealistic. Some of those figures have had to be changed. The DES "Report on Education 100" brought the figures up a little, but suffice it to say that the University Grants Committee does not believe in the X or Y variants for projected student numbers. It is all part of the Government's grand design to reduce public expenditure. Meanwhile, education suffers.

I support education as an end in itself. I support the notion that anyone—whether a school child, student, worker or pensioner—should be able to avail himself of education if he can benefit from it in any way. It is the Government's duty to provide a system of education in which that can be achieved.

I want to ask the Secretary of State a question, but unfortunately I think I know his answer. I have heard him say different things during Question Time on education, but everyone has a chance to redeem himself. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that education should be available to all who can benefit from it? If he does not, why not? Surely the nation's wealth is in the generation that is growing up. We shall pay dearly if we waste talents.

The Clwyd county council is going through its budgetary exercise. Class sizes in the county are among the largest in Wales, but the council plans to cut the number of secondary school teachers by at least 122. That is planned so that the grant holdback provisions will not be too onerous. It is a substantial cut that is proposed by the officers. If they had decided to produce a budget with no holdback, many more teachers would be involved than the proposed five or six in each comprehensive school.

One headmaster has written to the parents of each of his pupils. He said:

"Quite simply it will mean that the school will not be able to provide the depth and variety of education that is the right of every child in the country. To be more specific: the 'O' level and CSE groups in Welsh, French and Religious Education will have to be combined. Examinations groups in Physics and Child Care will disappear."

It is deplorable that an important subject such as physics will disappear. Certain computer studies and design groups will also disappear if the cuts take place.

"German, Modular Technology, Pottery and Domestic Science are all at risk. All classes will have increased numbers."

The school concerned is Ysgol Bryn Alyn. It says something that a headmaster feels so strongly about what is happening to his school and the provisions for it that he has to write such a circular letter to every parent.

I find the situation deplorable. If the Government have any sense, and if they care about the wealth of the country and the generations to come, they will do something quickly.

The Teacher of 28 September 1984 says that half the schools studies in a survey used the help of unpaid parents to undertake essential school work. That cannot be right. If we want a proper education system we must pay for it. I am not saying that we are squandering money, but education costs money and needs investment. Eventually we shall be repaid, because we shall produce a civilised and educated population to create the wealth that we need.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My hon. Friend referred to parental help in schools. In which type school and in which areas do we expect the most help from parents? Does not the need for such help emphasise the divisions in our education system?

Dr. Marek: That is a valid point. I do not like the terms "middle class", "working class" or "ruling class", but the middle classes can afford to provide the textbooks and "minding" duties at certain times. They can afford to provide the little extras. In working-class schools, where there is the greatest deprivation, such extra help cannot be provided. Parents have no incentive because they know that even when their children are educated there will be no jobs for them.

Yesterday the Clwyd education committee voted not to implement cuts, but to go for a standstill budget for next year. That has to be ratified by the full council, but if a standstill budget is agreed and I were to ask the Secretary of State for Wales what he thought of that he would say that he would have seriously to consider rate-capping Clwyd county council next year. That is deplorable. We should try to unscramble the mix so that we can provide an education system which our people deserve and from which they can benefit.

In recent months steps have been taken to try to decrease the term of the standard three-year degree course to two years. There are arguments for doing that. Education is a life-long process and some people want to spend one or two years in further education before gaining vocational experience and then going back to education. I see the argument against the standard, rigid three-year pattern.

I suspect that the Government are trying to make the change because of their overriding desire to cut public expenditure. I hope that the Minister can reassure me. I hope that if changes are made it will be because of the desire to improve the balance and increase the mix of courses to allow different students to complete their education in the way that they wish. That is important to the development of education.

The two-year course for the diploma of higher education, introduced as a result of the James report in 1972, required two A-levels for entry. It was not a success and was abandoned because it was thought to be second-rate. I do not want the Government to pile on the agony by trying to make the majority of students enrol for second-rate education courses.

Three years are necessary for most courses. Students need a year to get used to higher education, which is different from that which they receive in school. Then they need a second year to digest the education. Only in the third year do they see the design of the course and the education system. Three years is particularly necessary for engineering courses. Some people are pressing for a four-year engineering course. Vocational courses often last five or six years. A law course at university takes only three years, but students have to continue studying beyond that. Medical courses also take longer than three years.

I hope that the Secretary of State will resist his Treasury taskmasters when they ask him to squeeze another £100 million out of the higher education budget. I hope that he will say, "No. So far, but no further." We must have a higher education system of which we can be proud and which will produce engineers, doctors, professionals and, more than that, a better-educated and therefore wealthier and more civilised nation.

I wish briefly to discuss course content. There have been little babblings from the Department about what should or should not be taught in our schools. What we teach, how we teach it and when we teach it is important to educational development. The Secretary of State complained bitterly about the content of the sociology course at the Open University. He said that economists had told him that it was wrong. Of course, those economists are his own paid lackeys. The right hon. Gentleman has instilled changes into the course. He should be careful about doing that, because extremism in both directions —Fascist and Stalinist—starts from such actions.

We know what happened in Germany before the second world war, and we know what is happening in Russia today. It tells its teachers that they must teach Marxism. If I told Conservative Members that our schools must teach Marxism between the hours of 9 am and 10 am every Monday and Wednesday, they would howl me down with screams of protest. The Fascist ideas in Germany resulted from the abandonment of consensus on what should be in a core curriculum. The Secretary of State said that our schools should teach history. He said that we should be proud of our past. If that is taken too far, it could lead to sad results.

I know of one or two actions of which I, as a British subject, am not very proud. I wonder whether anyone is proud of what we did as a nation in the opium wars in China. I wonder whether that is taught in our schools. It should be, because it is part of our history.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we should be proud of the fact that we are able to learn from our history? We do not have distorted history. It is important to teach that history and to learn from it.

Dr. Marek: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. However, there should be a balance of all types of history. I shall give a few more examples—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh, no."] Oh, yes. Conservative Members have been taught about the battles of Trafalgar and Waterloo, about the capture of the Falkland Islands and the turfing out of the Argentinian Governor 200 years ago. There is more to our history than that. I am making a serious point about the development of education. It is central to the motion and the amendment.

What about the treatment of conscientious objectors in world war 1? We are now beginning to learn of the Fascist and racist attitudes of the ruling classes during the 1920s and 1930s. We may have to wait for a few more decades before all is known.

We cannot be proud of what we have done in India. We used the Indian Army to police the whole of the Empire. That was paid for by the taxpayers of India. We destroyed India's textile industry. How could we be proud of the Amritsar massacre? Is that taught in our schools? What about the secret treaty of London in 1915 to bring Italy into the war? I wonder how many children are taught about that. There was our appalling intervention in Russia in 1918—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Paul Dean): Order. This is interesting history, but I am finding it a little difficult to relate the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the motion before us.

Dr. Marek: My remarks are central to the motion, because I am referring to educational development. It was the Secretary of State who said that we should teach history in a certain way. I must mention Ireland, our non-action after the potato blight, the highland clearances and the use of torture since 1945 in Northern Ireland, Kenya, Palestine and Cyprus. Of course, there are good parts to our history. My point is that we should allow our schools the freedom to teach. There should be no interference by the Secretary of State. This country has always believed in religious freedom, free speech and political freedom. We should also have the freedom to educate according to the wishes of our community.

Of course, I accept that there is an argument for a core curriculum. Everyone should learn certain things. No one would dispute that everyone should be numerate and able to multiply nine by seven and come up with 63. However, at a higher level of education there may be some argument about what should be taught. Some people may say that in the first year of university a mathematician should know how to solve linear differential equations with constant co-efficients. If there is a general consensus that something should be taught, it should be considered for inclusion in the core curriculum. However, if a body of opinion believes that something should not be taught, the Government should not impose that core curriculum against its wishes, because that would be to embark upon extremism. No nation can walk the road to righteousness without any guilt. Everybody feels guilt. Nothing is white and nothing is black.

I hope that the Secretary of State will consider the two major points that I have made in my speech. Irrespective of what the right hon. Gentleman says, local government does not have the facilities to provide a proper education system. Any of my hon. Friends could give countless examples of that—deprivation, not sufficient textbooks, bad school meals, not sufficient equipment and recreational equipment, not sufficient teachers and not sufficient subject possibilities.

One of the major causes of the problem is that, although the Government say that it is for the county councils to determine their priorities, we all know that the county councils have no fat left on them and that their financial priorities are limited. They have a difficult job to do if they are to provide any sort of moderate education provision. Will the Secretary of State stand up for education and ask for some education expenditure to be closed as disregarded expenditure? That would be a step in the right direction. I suggest that he goes to the Treasury to hear what it says. It will say no, of course, but we would judge him by the progress that he made in that fight.

I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will take into account the comments that I have made on a core curriculum. If we are to impose a core curriculum with the aim of furthering education development, it can be introduced only if there is consensus among the community at large that it is the right thing to do. That will be necessary wherever it is introduced and at whatever level.

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): I mean no disrespect to Opposition Members who know that they have spoken at great length, who have never been less than engaging and who for all I know are experts on the subjects on which they speak, when I say that Conservative Members know as well as they do what it is like to try to sneak across the lobby only to feel the heavy hand of a Whip on their shoulder. The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) must feel a sense of great bitterness when he considers the immense contribution that his once great party has made to education and at the same time surveys the empty green Benches behind him.

Mr. Sayeed: This is the first Opposition Supply day of the Session and one would expect Opposition Members to talk about a subject which concerns them passionately. The degree of passion which they feel for education is revealed by the presence now of only six Labour Back Benchers. There have been no more than four, five or six throughout the debate.

Mr. Parris: I agree with my hon. Friend but I shall not pursue that line. I am the last person to attempt a tour d'horizon of education——

Mr. Pawsey: May I gently draw my hon. Friend's attention to the few Labour Members present in the Chamber and to the lack of alliance Members? My hon. Friend might care to speculate on the whereabouts of Social Democratic party and Liberal party Members. These are matters that perhaps my hon. Friend should refer to and we look forward with interest to what he has to say.

Mr. Parris: I shall resist the temptation to do so and I shall speculate no further.

I planned to say a good deal on primary and secondary schooling, but almost all of it has already been said by my right hon. and hon. Friends and so I shall not repeat it. I am restrained from launching into that subject by the immensely kind and courteous way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science, received a small delegation from my constituency earlier this week to talk about the proposed closure of Hazelwood school. I shall say no more on that subject beyond venturing to him the thought that a county council which is about to spend £50,000 on recalling all school stationery to have it overprinted with "Derbyshire supports nuclear-free zones" might find it in its heart to keep going a smashing little school. I very much hope that my hon. Friend will come to the same conclusion.

The debate earlier in the Session on higher education preceded the autumn statement and a number of contributors to the debate have referred to the increases in parental contributions for which the autumn statement has paved the way. I hope that, as a vice-president of London Conservative students, I shall be forgiven for saying a few words about the increases.

I do not pretend that the levels of student grants or parental contributions are the most important subjects in further or higher education. The most important element is the maintenance of our institutions and the improvement of the quality of teaching within them.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that in the area which he represents the issue of student travel grants is of considerable importance because of the distances that students have to travel outside the Matlock area? The hon. Gentleman will be aware that I know the area fairly well. Perhaps he will agree with me that the cost of travelling to college in Derby, Sheffield or surrounding areas, where specialist facilities are available, is of importance to students in the area.

Mr. Parris: The hon. Gentleman interrupted my flow. In common with many other hon. Members, I intended to lay the ground, by a statement that I did not suppose that what I had chosen to speak about could be considered the most important matter in the world, for an explanation that I considered my chosen topic to be rather important. I accept that the levels of student grants and parental contributions must always take second place to maintaining the institutions and the teaching within them, but that has become precisely the problem for students and their parents.

When, as now, there is a shortage of resources, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has to take difficult decisions in deciding where the resources should go, when he has to choose between maintaining the level of the student grant and keeping parental contributions at the current level, and when he has to consider cutting into the resources allocated to the institutions themselves, he must make his decision, as he has on the basis that the most important consideration is the maintenance of the institutions, and that that must be done sometimes at the expense of the level of student grants. He has made the right decision.

That has been done year after year, and every year we have snipped a little more around the edges of the living standards of students and around the edges of the provision that we make available to help parents to maintain their children at college and at university. That snipping has continued over the years and it has been felt every year that there are more important things on which to spend the money than student grants and parental contributions. That will be the position every year, but the result of the snipping is that the real value of student grants has fallen steadily and the assistance that the state is able to give parents has similarly fallen. We are approaching the stage at which many students and parents will find themselves in genuine difficulties.

The changes unveiled in the autumn statement of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer mean that parents with an income of £13,000 will have to pay an extra £79 a year—an extra 10 per cent. on their previous year's contribution. Parents with an income of £18,000 will have to pay an extra £333, or 26 per cent. more than they did in the previous year. Those with an income of £20,000 to £22,000 will have to find an extra £725, or 46 per cent. more.

These increases will make life very difficult for students. They face difficulties when their parents are unwilling or unable to pay their full share of the contribution. There are difficulties for students who have to maintain themselves even on the full grant because its real value has fallen by about 16 per cent. since the grants were set and instituted in 1962. The real value has declined in London by 32 per cent. All these factors make life increasingly difficult for students in higher education.

I accept that my right hon. Friend has made the only decision open to him. I accept also that when resources are scarce the institutions and the quality of teaching within them must be protected almost at all costs. However, I hope that my right hon. Friend understands that student grants have been cut by about as much as students are able to stand and that parental contributions will have to be increased accordingly. That will be a sharp and cruel blow to many parents. It would not be fair to go very much further along the road that the Government and previous Governments have been following.

7.29 pm

Mr. Michael Carttiss (Great Yarmouth): I began my teaching career in those expansionist and exciting years under the Administration presided over by the present Earl of Stockton, whose maiden speech in another place yesterday I much appreciated hearing. The early 1960s were a challenging period in which to begin teaching. It was a time of great optimism, when bringing the advantages of further and higher education to many more young people was seen as not only a major opportunity but a necessity. As a teacher starting then, I had the pick of any job. There had been the beginnings of the expansion of higher education during the Macmillan years, but there were too few teachers for the jobs available. It was a time when we saw ahead falling rolls, eventually bringing smaller classes with all the benefits that they mean in education.

The spirit of optimism then, when as a new entrant to the profession I was perhaps more enthusiastic than I became later, contrasts to some extent with the times in which we live today. I do not agree with the hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes), who talked about the collapse of morale, but one must recognise that there is low morale today in many school staff rooms. It must be recognised also that, in many classrooms, young people look to the prospect of obtaining employment with increasing pessimism, and we must not ignore that aspect.

There is much that is positive in the contemporary education scene. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has brought to his office a candour and an intellectual honesty that has rightly challenged many of the practices that became accepted in the 1970s and that are now widely regarded as having led to much that is second-rate. As we have been clearly reminded more than once today, my right hon. Friend has presided over a period during which pupil numbers have fallen more than teacher numbers, so that at 17·8 pupils per teacher we have the best pupil-teacher ratio ever.

Expecting that there would be more Opposition Members present, I wrote that no amount of mocking from the Opposition can deny that fact—but there is no one there to mock. The best we heard came from the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), who condemned the Governments of the 19th century. We are now in the 1980s, and if the hon. Gentleman had had much to say that he felt would condemn the Government's policies, I am sure that he would have said it.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: It seems that the hon. Member is not looking carefully around the Chamber. If he does, he will find that there are almost as many Opposition Members present as Conservative Members. If the hon. Gentleman is so worried about the improvement in pupil-teacher ratios, is he satisfied with the fact that more than 1,250,000 children are taught in classes of more than 30 students and more than 170,000 children are taught in classes of more than 40 students?

Mr. Carttiss: I do not think that anyone would be satisfied with anything in education that does not represent the ideal that Rousseau saw as acceptable. We must live in the real world, where the parents of those children must pay taxes and rates and are already finding that burden too heavy.

The view that more money will mean better standards comes across the whole time. What goes on in our schools depends less on finance and more on personnel—the teachers. One of the disadvantages in the great expansion of teacher training places in the 1960s was that some entrants were inadequately prepared and were not motivated for the profession. I welcome the commitment of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the need for a regular appraisal of teachers' performance. He has rightly emphasised that there is an absolute requirement for that.

Except during the probationary year that so many of us went through when we entered teaching in the 1960s, we were never examined for competence in the classroom. We were never required to submit ourselves to objective assessment.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Will the hon. Gentleman define what he means by "objective assessment"? Who is to conduct those systems of appraisal of teachers in the classroom?

Mr. Carttiss: The profession has often sought to exercise its ability to judge the quality of its members, and there would be considerable encouragement of that aim. The teaching profession has sought to establish itself—I have been a member of it and have sought to back its campaign—to obtain the sort of competence that would be judged acceptable by those fellows who are successful in the profession. Teachers in the classroom know very well the colleagues who are incompetent and those who are able and whose example they wish to follow. There is no difficulty in the Secretary of State introducing a method of objective assessment so that colleagues in the profession and the advisory service—in many parts of the country that service is highly skilled—have an opportunity to see people at work in the classroom more regularly than has been the case.

Mr. Sayeed: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is already an objective assessment of how schools are going—the HMIs' assessment? If it is possible to assess objectively what the schools are doing, it is, therefore, possible to assess objectively the performance of teachers, and that is already being done by professionals.

Mr. Carttiss: There is merit in my hon. Friend's observations, but I do not share his view that the inspectorate is necessarily the right body to perform that task. One would not necessarily see the HMI report on Norfolk as an example of everyday factual experience of teaching in ordinary situations, from which HMIs sometimes seem to be distant. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is carefully considering that aspect. I hope that colleagues in the teaching profession will recognise that nothing but good for their status and the regard in which they are held in the community can come from a method of objective assessment. Many teachers are undertaking objective assessment now. I talked about people entering the teaching profession in the 1960s when I started, and how they were not assessed more than once in the one year of their probationary service. The fact is that many of those teachers have gone on to take Open University courses. They have taken on part-time degree courses at their local university. Within the profession, a large body of people have already sought to improve and extend their qualifications and expertise. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), who left the Chamber a few moments ago, and the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) were right to speak highly of the majority of teachers.

Between 1971 and 1981, the population in Norfolk increased by 70,000. Proportionately, that is a larger and faster growth than most other counties have experienced. It represents a faster growth than for the nation as a whole. Although recently there has been an increase in the birth rate, that population growth comes mainly from people moving from other parts of the country — often, it seems, from those parts of the country administered by profligate and high-spending Labour-controlled authorities. Although we experience the problem of falling rolls in some parts of the county, schools are overcrowded in others.

The HMI report on national trends published in 1982 expressed anxiety about resource provision in four local authorities in particular. That led to Norfolk being condemned as one of four local education authorities at the bottom of the league. The then chief inspector and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have emphasised that that did not refer to performance, but it led the county council to ask the HMI to make a general survey of four specific areas of the county. The report gained national attention at the beginning of this month and prompted a letter in The Guardian from the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice), most of which I agree with.

Although I have had some doubts about the practical day-to-day teaching experience of HMIs generally, to which I have already referred, on the whole I should not wish to denigrate the value of their report about Norfolk, nor would I dispute most of their conclusions.

The education committee of which I have been a member for 17 years cannot escape its share of responsibility for some of the criticisms in the report levelled at the lack of resources. The county council, rightly in my view, has consistently sought, year by year, to limit its expenditure. It has been economical since the distinguished Labour Secretary of State for the Environment, Tony Crosland, said, "The party is over," in reference, all those years ago, to the need to restrain local government spending.

Norfolk's net expenditure on education for 1983-84 was £104·8 million. That was almost equivalent to the assessment of grant-related expenditure on education for rate support grant purposes. If the county council budgets at the same level—allowing for inflation—to provide for the same requirements next year as it financed last year, in Norfolk we shall be running into penalty. I ask my right hon. Friend to draw to the attention of the Secretary of State for the Environment the need to look again at the way he and his Department have been dealing with the consistently low-spending local authorities in East Anglia, because the major part of county council expenditure is on education, and that is where we cannot contemplate more reductions.

Norfolk has already gone on the long road towards rationalising and economising in the provision of school dinners. I can never understand why people become upset about children choosing chips and gravy. I suspect that only about one child out of 200 in any school goes for that abomination. Most children have their pocket money and buy what they want. Those who are entitled to a free school meal have it to the value of 50p and they do not have to spend that on chips and gravy; they can spend it on a piece of meat and plenty of salad. I reject the view that we should not be studying means of economising on our school meals service to enable money to be spent on school books and equipment and to provide teachers. That is something that Norfolk has done.

Dr. Marek: I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman could find anywhere in the country where he could have chips and meat for 50p. If the children have 50p, I am sorry to say that it is chips and gravy for many of them.

Mr. Carttiss: I have had the privilege this morning of showing around the House 40 young people from a middle school in my constituency. I should be delighted for the hon. Gentleman to have lunch with me there. For 50p plus VAT for adults, he will find that he can have chips and a piece of meat at the West Flegg middle school, Martham, as I know.

Mr. Bermingham rose——

Mr. Carttiss: Many of us in Norfolk took a long time to be convinced that bringing in a comprehensive school system would achieve improvements in the quality of education. Some of the problems identified in the HMI report relate to anxieties that some of us had about comprehensive schools generally. I do not regret the fact that reorganisation came about eventually, but at a pace that we thought was right. Incidentally, the legislation put through the House by the then Socialist Administration, denying local authorities the right to determine their own system of education, represented then a major infringement of local powers that makes the current cries from the Opposition Benches about rate capping hypocritical in the extreme.

Our unwillingness in Norfolk from 1974 to 1978 to abolish our grammar schools led to the then Labour Administration declining to approve various capital expenditure schemes unless they led directly to a comprehensive school system.

The anxieties to which I have referred are not unfamiliar and are related to the possibility that "Much of the work of secondary school pupils would be geared towards those of average ability."

That was the anxiety that we felt about comprehensive education. That is one of the judgments on some of the schools in Norfolk today that we read in the HMI report. It also says that it "is a problem by no means confined to schools inspected in Norfolk."

We must support and encourage the teachers, and I believe that hon. Members are interested in and keen to give teachers the praise that they rightly deserve for the enormous amount of time that they give up during their lunch hours and evenings. It is a pity that some of their leaders in the professional associations, which have now affiliated to the TUC and see themselves more as industrial bodies than professional organisations, do not show the same recognition of that dedication to duty. That is not a question of spending policies.

There is more that I wish to say but, in contrast to the hon. Member for Wrexham, I know that several other Conservative Members are anxious to contribute to the debate. I welcome my right hon. Friend's initiative on the curriculum. It needs to be broadly based, relevant and balanced. I was interested in the comments about ensuring that everyone knows all about the opium wars. I thought that the modern trend in the so-called progressive element was towards peace studies—to show everyone how, by throwing down our arms, we would ensure peace. That was the mistake that the Chinese made in 1840-41.

The Secretary of State has spoken about the common ground that exists in the House. Notwithstanding the remarks that I have happily provoked from the Opposition Benches, which earlier had seemed dead, I believe that there is common ground between us. I welcome the fact that the Secretary of State has shown his ability to agree in some measure with some of the remarks of the hon. Member for Durham, North.

There is much more to be said, but I believe that the Government's current education policies can be backed with complete confidence. However, while more money does not mean, ipso facto, better education, we need to recognise that less money will not produce a higher quality of education.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): To a great extent this debate has dealt with English matters, but it would be wise to remind ourselves of several universal truths.

I should like to ask the Tory party several questions. I have been stimulated to do so by the extraordinary speech by the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Carttiss). I sometimes wonder who on earth teaches the members of the Tory party. There must be a special little school producing those extraordinary philosophies and ideas—from chips with gravy to chips with everything. I do not think that anyone will disagree when I say that this is the most mean-minded and philistine Government that Britain has suffered since the 17th century. Charles I was not bad but this Government——

Dr. Godman: My hon. Friend is being too harsh on the English.

Mr. Buchan: Of course, Charles I was Scots, but he had particular problems.

This most mean-minded and philistine Government have a hatred of learning. I should like to examine what has been done by them and by the Secretary of State. I should like to remind hon. Members of the wise words of Marghanita Laski, who wondered what on earth would be the response if we had no libraries, but someone, for example in the Greater London council or the House, stood up and said that he had a good idea, stating, "Let us put up a building, four walls and a roof, put shelves in it and books on the shelves, and let people borrow the books free of charge." Imagine the reception that that idea would get from Conservative Members, who would see it as another phenomenon of Red Ken, and as the Left paying out more public money. Victorian philanthropy introduced libraries, and it is several degrees more progressive than the present Tory party. It is extraordinary, but that is precisely what would happen.

What worries me are statements about books by the Minister for the Arts, Lord Gowrie, who is also responsible for libraries. He made an extraordinary speech when opening a library — one of the products of Victorian philanthropy that Tory Members seem to hate so much—deploring the fact that not enough was being charged. He recommended the library to charge for every possible service related to it. He recommended that where it was legal for the library to make charges it should do so, because, if a charge was made, the user would appreciate what he or she was getting. It is an extraordinary philosophy that when a charge is made the user will appreciate what she or he is getting. There is only one profession of which that would be a proper description —prostitution. The prerogative of the harlot through the ages has now become the philosophy of the Government.

The Tory party is the party of gentlemen. The definition of a Tory gentleman is someone who develops a life of enhanced leisure. The Tories are making sure that plenty of leisure is given to people. There is leisure for the unemployed, but they will not let it be enhanced leisure.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Did my hon. Friend notice that the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Carttiss) admitted that he thought that the Government should spend more, so he pleaded guilty to the charge that there was a lack of books, to which the school inspectors' report drew special attention?

Mr. Buchan: It is true not only of the hon. Gentleman's area in Norfolk but——

Mr. Spearing: But of Oxford too.

Mr. Buchan: Nothing is sacred from the juggernaut of the philistines in the Tory party, not even Oxford.

Another sinister development is the proposition that is going around in the Treasury to extend value added tax to books and publications. It is no use saying that the Government would not do anything as monstrous as that. They have been capable of it. For example, they have already extended VAT to takeaway food. There are only about three more areas left into which VAT can be extended. The first is children's clothes, the second is food, in addition to hot takeaway food, and the third is books and publications. Clearly, the Government do not want to arouse the anger of mothers by putting VAT on children's clothes. They do not want to face the contumely that would come with the extension of VAT to all foods. They had enough trouble with Chinese takeaways. That leaves books and publications. We know that their beady eye is fixed upon them.

That has never been repudiated. We have tabled question after question asking the Government to state publicly that they will no longer consider the proposition of putting VAT on books. They have carefully avoided doing any such thing. I should like to remind Tory Members that that proposition was last put forward, in August 1940 by Kingsley Wood, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer. That was the time when Churchill was exhorting us to fight on the beaches, but the Government were saying, "Let us put a tax on books." What happened? The whole House of Commons, including A.P. Herbert, said, "We are fighting for the things that matter. We are fighting for values. We shall not put a tax on books despite the difficulty that this country is in." In the height of that crisis in the summer of 1940 that proposition was rejected by the House not only with contempt but in a gale of laughter. That imposition of VAT would have had to apply to all books, including the Bible and, as A.P.Herbert said, it would have been the first time in history that the word of God had been taxed.

But the Tory party is prepared to do that. It says, "Shakespeare—poof. The Bible—poof. Let us get the money in." That is what the Tories' concept is. They say that if it is good to make a charge, it is even better if one can add 15 per cent. to it. Thus VAT becomes a sort of good so that the customer will appreciate books all the more. If he appreciates being charged, he will appreciate it more if 15 per cent. more is added to it. I hope that before the night is out the Minister will tell us that the Government will not go ahead with the noxious proposition of putting a tax on books.

Mr. Powley: I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman is saying. I am not privy to any information as to what the Treasury might do in the next Budget, but is he aware that books and publications are subject to tax on the continent, in many European countries? Will he apply his mind to the thinking behind the actions of Socialist countries in the EEC that put a tax on books, periodicals and so on?

Mr. Buchan: I cannot think of any Socialist Government who initiated a tax on books, but the hon. Gentleman is right in saying that almost every country in Europe imposes a tax on books. That is precisely why we are worried. Tory Members want harmonisation of taxation. Furthermore, as costs are rising and as the ludicrous common agricultural policy continues, there is a growing demand for a bigger return from VAT. The Government have already increased by 40 per cent. this year the 1 per cent. on own resources. They can do one of only two things. Either they can increase VAT to meet the costs or they can broaden the range. When I have questioned the Treasury on that, I have been told that the Government's policy is to cut back on personal taxation, that is the tax on income, and to place tax on spending, in other words VAT. I challenge any Conservative Member flatly to deny that the Government will not tax books. I pause, as Shakespeare said, for a reply, but none dare reply, as they know that their Front Bench is capable of such a monstrosity. [HON. MEMBERS: "Nonsense."] If that is the case, I should like one Conservative Member to stand up and deny on behalf of the Government that they will not do it. They did not do it in 1940 when our backs were to the wall. Not one Conservative Member trusts the Government enough to deny it. That is the extent of their faith in their own Government.

If books and publications are to be taxed, there will be, by definition, a tax on knowledge and learning matter. A tax on learning and knowledge is a tax on democracy as it is not possible to have democracy unless there is an informed democracy. One of the problems at the moment is the profound attack on democracy that the present price of books presents, but that ignores the financial censorship that would arise from a tax on books. If Conservative Members do not remember 1940 they may remember when a tax was last put on publications. It was the Stamp Act of the 18th century, the result of which was Britain's loss of the American colonies. That is a hell of a price to pay for taxing books.

Dr. Godman: Might I compliment my hon. Friend on raising the level of the debate? That is to be expected as he is a product of the Scottish education system. Is he aware that the Western Isles council has had to make the sad decision not to buy any books for its libraries this year because of the Government's refusal to give it the assistance that it badly needs?

Mr. Buchan: I know about the acute problems of the Western Isles. My hon. Friend has given a sad commentary of the state of affairs to which the Government and their minions in the Scottish Office have brought us. If there was one thing of which we were proud in Scotland it was our devotion to learning, books and education. The Western Isles' main exports used to be herring and professors.

Dr. Godman: And master mariners.

Mr. Buchan: I apologise; I should have remembered my hon. Friend. The problem can be seen to be acute, not so much as a result of the philosophy of the Minister for the Arts, who believes that what has to be paid for is good for people — with all the dangers that that holds for schools and universities—as by considering who leads the Conservative party. When the Prime Minister was Secretary of State for Education and Science she was known by the children of Britain as Maggie Thatcher, the milk snatcher. Have we forgotten that? There is something else. It was under her vice-regal control of the Department of Education and Science that museum charges were imposed. It is important to education and to an understanding of the world that museums and galleries should be open to all. She ran into difficulties because many of the bequests in our museums were made on condition that they be shown freely. One thinks of the Erskine of Torry bequest by which the Government were so badly hurt when attempting to introduce charges in Scotland. The matter is serious because charges are being encouraged by the Minister for the Arts and because the maritime museum has been given permission to make charges. Permission has been given on the premise—the philosophy of the prostitute—that if a charge is made the user will appreciate what he or she gets. The Minister said that making charges will encourage people to go only if they have a real interest—so that they will not go just on a whim. I favour people going to museums and galleries just on a whim. None of us knows what sparks off a kid's interest and desire to expand knowledge. I would prefer that people went into a museum to shelter from the rain rather than just stand in a bus shelter.

We see the same attitude from the Secretary of State, who is no longer here—I was about to say, "Who is no longer with us", but that would, perhaps, be too good to be true—in regard to arts schools. The Government are pressing schools of art to amalgamate and merge under some phoney economic argument when the whole point of education in the arts is to have individuality in our independent free-standing schools or colleges of art. We can see the effects of that pressure on one of our great national institutions, the Royal College of Art. It will now halt entry into the department of environmental design. After allowing the freebooters of the 1950s and 1960s to despoil our cities, the Government are now stopping people from studying how to create a better environment. Entry is also being halted into the design education unit, environmental media studies, and the department of design research and the intake into the departments of painting, printing, photography, ceramics and cultural history is to be reduced. The Conservative party really hates culture.

Mr. Spearing: Yes, the Tories tax it.

Mr. Buchan: They are the new philistines. I regret to say that the Tory gentlemen have long gone.

The Secretary of State has concentrated on design but the best British design has not come from the consciously mechanical or industrial design schools. Many of the great advances in design for which Britain is known throughout the world in recent years have come out of the art schools. Fashion design, for example, came from art schools. Faced with all of this evidence, we realise that the Government dislike learning. They have a price for everything and a value for nothing. As a result, some institutions are fighting back. I was delighted to learn that deans of faculties of arts at most of our universities have formed a standing committee to defend values and to say that there is more to life than creating efficient robot societies. Learning is concerned with rather more than that.

Some of us will have to fight to defend civilisation in the face of this philistinism. Perhaps we can get just one mark of response from the Government today showing that they will no longer encourage charging for entry to museums and that they will drop the nonsensical proposition of taxing books. They should turn their attention to providing our people with the enhanced leisure that should be the result of education.

8.8 pm

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): I hope that the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) will forgive me if I do not follow him down the road that he signposted. I found it interesting that he embraced Victorian beliefs. He talked about Victorian values and philosophy, and it is clear that he and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister have much in common. Only on one thing did I seriously fault him. I was under the impression that we lost the American colonies because of a tax on tea, not a tax on stamps.

Mr. Buchan: I do not want to give a history lesson, but the most important factor in bringing together the 13 colonies was the Stamp Act, which was a tax on publications, papers and legal matter. The tea in Boston harbour was a nice little exciting coup d'etat rather than an effective cause.

Mr. Pawsey: The hon. Member will agree with me that it was the exciting act of theatre in Boston that brought matters to a head and effectively led to the loss of the colonies.

I intend to speak to the debate, which is more than Opposition Members have done. The fact that they have had to wheel in speakers to talk about opium wars, India and Ireland, to bolster their argument, and to take up time, is an indication of the paucity of their thinking.

The opening speech by the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) was disappointing. It seldom rose above the level of the cheque book. Today we have been subjected, not to cheque book journalism, but to cheque book education. The Opposition do not seek to judge education by standards. They try to judge it by the amount of funding available. That seems to be the main thrust of the Opposition's argument. Their argument seems to be that more money automatically equals better education. I am pleased that the hon. Member for Durham, North has returned to his place. No doubt he will intervene in due course. The Opposition's premise is a doubtful one and is not borne out by the facts.

Concern about education is not new. Parents and educationists have felt disquiet for years. If there is any doubt about that, I remind the Opposition of the education Black Papers which my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson) did so much to bring into being. They were published in the mid and late 1960s.

If Opposition Members do not like references to Black Papers, they should remember that the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) initiated the great debate on education and educational standards in 1976. That debate was an attempt to draw attention to what was properly seen as a decline in standards. But if money were the answer, why did education not greatly improve between the years 1960 and 1980? [HON. MEMBERS: "It did."] No, it did not. Expenditure increased dramatically in that period. On primary schools it increased by 60 per cent. in real terms and on secondary schools by 44 per cent.

That is not the only measure that can be used to gauge the amount of spending on education and decide whether more money really equals better education. An alternative is to consider public expenditure on education as a percentage of gross domestic product. In 1960 the percentage in France was 3·4 per cent., in West Germany 3·7 per cent., and in the United Kingdom 4·2 per cent. In 1970 the percentage in France was 4·9 per cent., in West Germany 3·7 per cent., and in the United Kingdom 5·3 per cent. In 1980 the figure for France was 5 per cent., for West Germany 5·6 per cent., and for the United Kingdom 5·8 per cent. We have spent more than our competitors and yet we remain concerned about the quality of education. Opposition Members have not proved the connection between more spending and a better quality of education.

Mr. Radice: Opposition Members may have failed to prove the point, but the hon. Gentleman has just done so. Spending increased in the years that he mentioned, and examination results also improved greatly in that period. The percentages of those passing A-levels, those gaining five O-levels or more, and those leaving school with some examination successes rose in that period.

Mr. Pawsey: The hon. Gentleman has not followed my argument. If what he says is correct, why was it thought necessary to produce the Black Papers? Why did the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth open the great debate? The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. Examination results improved, but they did not improve by 44 per cent. We were not getting value for the money invested in education. There is no automatic relationship between increased spending and an improvement in education.

Mr. Bermingham: Nobody said there was.

Mr. Pawsey: Opposition Members seem to be arguing that more money equals better standards.

Mr. Bermingham: Unless the hon. Gentleman did not take either A-levels or O-levels, he may know from personal experience that the standards required to pass O-levels and A-levels rose substantially between 1960 and 1980.

Mr. Pawsey: The hon. Gentleman has not been listening, either. If that is so, why did his right hon. Friend start the great debate? Why were the Black Papers published? Why has there been concern among parents, teachers and Governments about the quality of education?

One cannot judge the education service by the funding. Funding is only one of the benchmarks that can be used. Perhaps a better reason for the expressed concern might be found in the reorganisation of education between the early 1960s and early 1970s. Can it be coincidence that it was during and after that major reorganisation that concern about standards properly began to surface? Can it be coincidence that the move away from a selective to a comprehensive system coincided with an expression of disquiet about standards of education? It is fair to say that Her Majesty's inspectors have drawn attention in report after report to the low expectations of teachers. They say that pupils are not stretched and that lower standards are tolerated.

Perhaps we could change all that by bringing together the more academic pupils. That would generate a healthy spirit of competition, which would stimulate their interest and that of teaching staff. I would not argue the case for another major reorganisation of education, but we should encourage the LEAs to allow the emergence of schools which would cater for the academically bright.

My right hon. Friend has already said elsewhere that he will consider any schemes for a gradual movement away from the comprehensive principle. It might be worth reminding the LEAs of that point. We should be spending less time arguing about money, and more time debating the education system itself.

I should like to put four questions to the House. First, does the present education system cater for the brighter pupils? Secondly, does it give job satisfaction to the teaching staff? Thirdly, does it provide value for money? Fourthly, and most importantly of all, could we not improve upon the present system? Even by the criterion of the Opposition, that more money automatically means better standards, we are not doing as well as we should. However, it is fair to remind the Opposition that spending per pupil in real terms has increased since 1979 and that the pupil-teacher ratio in the United Kingdom has never been better.

Incidentally, opposition Members might turn their attention, not just to the pupil-teacher ratio, but to the Opposition-Government ratio. It is surprising how few official Opposition Members are present for a debate initiated by the Opposition.

Mr. Radice: Where are the Conservative Members?

Mr. Pawsey: This is an Opposition debate, but the Opposition are having difficulty in sustaining it. That is my criticism of Labour Members, and it is a criticism that will stand. When hon. Members read the debate in Hansard, they will agree that Labour Members do not care about education. If they did, they would now be in the Chamber.

Despite what Labour Members say, falling rolls do not invalidate the figures that I have provided for pupil-teacher ratios and higher per-capita spending. The education service must respond to a dramatic reduction in pupil numbers. That is the choice of parents; it is not a draconian measure introduced by Whitehall. There is no Herod in Elizabeth house.

To emphasise the point about falling rolls, it is interesting to note that in 1977-78 there were 8·5 million children in our schools. By 1990 that figure will have dropped to 6·6 million. Such a remarkable reduction in pupil numbers represents a dramatic revolution that will echo through society for decades to come, and the implications of that revolution must be fully understood.

Recently, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced measures that will lift standards. I say that deliberately and despite the somewhat cavalier comments of the hon. Member for Durham, North. My right hon. Friend has sought to improve the quality of teaching by making available an additional £8·5 million for in-service training. He is ensuring that student teachers will spend about 15 weeks at the chalk face. Moreover, they will specialise in age ranges and in one or two subjects. He is making available to local education authorities a further £14 million to help them to employ replacement teachers, to improve training in school management and to help to overcome the problems of shortage subjects.

My right hon. Friend will be calling for a regular appraisal of teachers. Clearly, he believes that there is a positive relationship between well-trained teachers and higher standards. He is right to draw that conclusion, because education depends above all on the interaction of minds. The teacher holds the key. There is a fairly simple equation in education: if there is good head teacher, he will attract good staff; if there is good staff, it will be a good school. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am delighted to hear those echoes of agreement. I join Conservative Members in applauding the work of teachers, who do their best in what are not always the easiest of times.

Mr. Spearing: On Thursday of last week, in reply to an intervention in which I suggested that the Secretary of State wished to impose on teachers a cut in pay, the right hon. Gentleman implied that he would be willing to contemplate a little more pay for teachers, or even more than that, if they agreed to the system of evaluation that he is now presenting. If that is so—the Secretary of State is here and can correct me if I am wrong—does the hon. Gentleman believe that he will get the best from teachers by saying, "I will cut your pay unless you accept my system of appraisal, even if it is accepted as possible"? Would he be a good headmaster?

Mr. Pawsey: The hon. Gentleman is using his parliamentary expertise to pose a question to me which, had he been here at the start of the debate, he should have more properly put to my right hon. Friend. Therefore, he will forgive me if I do not answer him. It will teach him to be here earlier next time.

I welcome plans for more parental involvement. Those plans will raise standards, because, irrespective of party dogma, parents will undoubtedly seek the best for their children. They are unlikely to promote peace studies, for example, if that promotion is at the expense of mathematics or English. Parents, using the powers which I hope they will receive in the not-too-distant future, will ensure that the standards at their children's schools are as good as they can be. Nothing concentrates the parental mind as much as their children experiencing the latest progressive fashions.

I read with some interest in The Times yesterday an article entitled, "Why Meacher was the last straw", by Mr. Eric Moonman, a former Labour Member of Parliament, who has now seen the light. He said:

"Members of local health authorities who are also Labour Party members are being asked, on House of Commons paper, to record, for the benefit of Mr. Meacher, details of the sex, age, political affiliation and voting habits of all members of the authority."

That is what is happening in health authorities. If Labour Members have their way, how long will it be before a letter on House of Commons paper goes to school governing bodies? We do not want that. We need more involvement of parents in the schools which their children attend.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pawsey: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment — [Interruption.] I am sorry, but I am being pressed not to give way by my hon. Friends, who have a genuine interest in the debate. I have given way a great deal, so the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not do so now.

I was disappointed that no Labour Member referred to religious education. The subject interests many thousands of parents, and I hope that the safeguards with reference to religious education that were built into the Education Act 1944 are retained, because they are so important.

The Gracious Speech mentioned the European Court ruling on corporal punishment, and to comply with the ruling the Government will soon introduce a Bill. It is an unhappy matter. It is unfortunate that the European Court did not give sufficient consideration to the customs and traditions of the United Kingdom. We have used caning as a means of discipline for many years, but other countries have different systems. In France, schools believe in suspension, and when a child is suspended from a French school the social security benefits which are normally paid are not given for the duration of the suspension. That is a much more draconian punishment than the one we employ in the United Kingdom. It affects not only the child but the whole family, and that is to be regretted.

Eastern European schools operate a different system. The child's misdemeanours are posted on the notice board at the father's workplace so that all his colleagues can see what his child has been up to at school. How would Opposition Members take a Bill that sought to introduce that in place of corporal punishment? It is an unhappy business to recognise this court ruling. I realise that we have little choice if we are to remain within the law, but it is unfortunate that the traditions and customs of our country have not received fair consideration from the European Court.

8.30 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): A few moments ago the Labour party was accused of not taking education seriously, in a speech that, with great respect to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey), contained not only error, wrong assumptions and cant, but an over-large amount of rubbish. To start at the end, the hon. Gentleman does not know or recognise that we are the only country in the civilised world that seems to think that it is permissible for children to be beaten, sometimes in public, for their misdemeanours. The Americans, the Canadians, the Australians, the French, the Germans, the Russians and the Poles do not need to do it—across Europe nobody does it. Apparently, we have some hedonistic instinct that leads us to tolerate such behaviour. My only regret is that the Government did not have the courage to go all the way and ban corporal punishment once and for all. As sure as night will follow day, corporal punishment will come to an end in both the public and private sectors before the century is out. When it does, we shall have taken one further step on the road to civilisation.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Teachers are now being left very isolated, with few sanctions that they can enforce. In ideal circumstances, there would be massive parental support when there is indiscipline by the child in school. However, much consideration has to be given in these less than ideal circumstances to ways of providing support to teachers if corporal punishment in schools is to be finally banned. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that in the meantime we should not rush headlong until we have established sanctions that are acceptable and will be supportive of teachers in classrooms. On many occasions they have to face assault from unruly pupils.

Mr. Bermingham: The hon. Gentleman is trying to put the cart after the horse, as is normal. In removing corporal punishment, we are seeking to remove a barbaric practice that has been shown by psychiatrists to have effect in later life. As well as removing corporal punishment —this is why I hope that the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues will follow the Opposition into the Lobby tonight—we should be putting into schools the support system that teachers need and deserve, and that are called for in our motion. The interesting difference between the Opposition motion and the Government amendment—a difference that occurs in many other matters—is merely of one missing word. The word missing from the Government motion is "investment", which is present in our motion. The Government seem frightened of the word "investment".

The hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth failed lamentably to speak about investment. I do not propose to go over his speech inch by inch, because that would take a long time. His speech could be readily answered because it contained so many errors of fact. I agree that pupil-teacher ratios are falling, as are the numbers of pupils. Do we not have a heaven-sent opportunity as a result? We have the buildings, but we are now talking about mothballing schools, closing them or selling them. This is the Government of the quick buck. Anything that they can lay their hands on and sell, they will get rid of, whether it is playing fields, schools or whatever. What do they do with the proceeds? Do they invest in our industries or society? No — the money goes in handouts to their supporters, when it should be going into investment, because education is an investment in the future. It is an investment in the generations to come.

I am not satisfied with the standards in our schools. In the past 20 years, they have increased greatly, but they are still not high enough. I want to see more investment. I want children to be better educated. People should be able to go back later in their lives for further education, which is further investment in them as human beings and further investment in our society and in our future. That is the sort of education system towards which we should be moving, but we are not. At best we are standing still, and in some cases we are declining.

Over the past 20 or 30 years, HMI reports have said that only one fifth of LEAs have made satisfactory or better provision for library assistance, the programme of maintenance in schools has continued to be less than satisfactory or poor in 54 of the 97 LEAs, and in two fifths of the LEAs the provision of books and equipment was less than satisfactory. Nothing seems to be right—we are simply not meeting standards. Why is that? I have the horrible sick feeling that the reason is that many of the sons and daughters of Government supporters are in private sector schools. The rest of us can go to the wall in the public sector. I have said before and I shall say again that the Government's attitude is, "If you can pay for it you can have it but if you look to the state to provide it you will get the minimum to get by."

I welcome the movement from examinations to assessments in the Sheffield speech. I have some experience of the education world, having taught for about a year, been a governor of many schools and a vice-chairman of a further education college for some years, and having gone through the system myself. I have always felt that to judge a child on the results of examinations such as the 11-plus, O-level or A-level, which is one performance, is unfair. He or she might not be well or might have trouble at home, or have pressures on him or her. It is far better for the child's development during that year of schooling to be the measure of its advancement. That reflects the child's capability, so I welcome this movement.

However, I am worried about the problem of a national curriculum. Education is meant to reflect the area where the child is educated. The needs of Durham and of Surrey are in some ways different, because of the different environments, and education should reflect those environments. I am worried about the idea that "London knows best".

Mr. Spearing: Whitehall knows best.

Mr. Bermingham: My hon. Friend is correct—Whitehall knows best.

There should be certain levels in mathematics, science, English, history and other such subjects, but I do not accept the concept that the content of the history course can be laid down, because that can reflect a political view, and it worries me. There might be, just as there was last Session, a move by a Government Back Bencher to ban peace studies, for example. Children have a right to be taught such subjects. Once we begin to ban, to proscribe and to say that this or that shall not be taught, we are on the road to totalitarianism. It is the road that was trodden in Germany in the 1930s and in parts of Russia from 1918 onwards. It is a road where Big Brother or Whitehall knows best. That is what worries me about a national school curriculum. I do not object to levels of attainment being suggested and agreed by discussion. I object to dictation from Whitehall or anywhere else, because that is not in the interests of the children.

Many Opposition Members are deeply worried about education. We do not believe that we have yet put enough investment into it. We have improved it and, in many Socialist-controlled local authorities such as my own, levels of achievement have been improving. I know from personal experience as a member of a local education committee for some six years that levels went up steadily over that period. However, Opposition Members do not believe that we have gone far enough. We know that there is still a need for more. We know that improvement is necessary, and we are determined to see that society gets what it deserves, which is a first-class education service. But that requires investment, which we fear this Government will not make.

8.42 pm

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): It has been rightly said in this debate that the standard of education has not changed for the worse in terms of resources since 1979. Looking at the amount of money spent on each pupil in our system today, we see that more money is being spent proportionately than ever before. The pupil-teacher ratio is better. We are spending £7·7 billion, which is a great deal of money and which compares extremely favourably with the year 1979-80, when only £4·6 billion was spent.

During that period, we have seen a great drop in the number of pupils. I do not seek to say to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the education system should merely stand still on that basis. The purpose of my argument is to encourage him to have vision, to look at the sort of education system that we want in the future and, therefore, to plan ahead.

I appreciate my right hon. Friend's problems. All of us do. We have an economy which is dependent to too large an extent on oil exports. We have to strengthen that economy so that, in the future, basic industries can produce, without the aid of oil, sufficient money to pay for good education and social services systems.

I was always brought up to believe that the time to plan was when one had nothing. In my opinion, this is the time to plan.

The position today is quite simple. We face a social revolution that we in the House cannot afford to ignore. In the future, people will not work in the way that they have in the past, on the basis of full employment. That being so, the sort of education system that we have to create is one that will prepare people for fewer working hours, for earlier retirement and for staying on longer at school. We should be planning that system now.

Two factors come immediately to mind. The first is the need for greater training and education for the jobs of the future, which inevitably will require skills. It will be no good to have no skill. Only those with skills will have jobs. We must also educate for leisure. That is the way that we must go and we must look at our education system in that light.

The days of the cycle in which one left the family and had a child, that child went to school and was educated, he left school, found a job and immediately began the cycle again, have gone. Society is changing fundamentally, and that is the message that we have to get across to the pupils in our schools. It is the educative function that we must get across to them.

I appreciate that there are problems today with funding, but looking to the future we must produce the best quality teachers. In my opinion, it is wrong that we pay a head teacher in a primary school £12,000. Bearing in mind the responsibility of the job, it is a wholly inadequate salary. A grade 1 teacher on scale 1 starting to teach earns about £75 or £80 a week take-home pay, with all his training. We have to rectify this for the future. We have to give people an incentive to go into the teaching profession. Only in that way shall we produce the best education system.

We face falling rolls in our secondary schools of dramatic proportions in the next few years. We must work towards protecting the curriculum base of those schools, and that means——

Mr. Dunn: Now.

Mr. Hind: I am glad to hear my hon. Friend say that. I agree that we must begin now and work towards it.

A third factor that I press upon my hon. Friend is the need for the implementation of the Warnock report and providing the resources for bringing disabled children into our schools and making sure that they are properly cared for and suitably able to be taught.

A fourth factor has already been alluded to by one of my hon. Friends. It is to take the politicisation out of our school system. At present, we have too much of it. The Lancashire education committee, with which I am familiar, provides a good example. There are areas of my constituency which time and time again elect Conservative councillors with enormous majorities, yet the schools and their governing bodies are dominated by Labour party supporters, who do not represent the community. I impress upon the House the need for governing bodies that are community-based. What is more, I do not mean just parents, because I do not go all the way with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in wanting to see a majority of parents. I want to see parents and teachers from the area.

I quote the example of a school in Aughton in my constituency, where a local councillor with a majority of 1,000 votes was removed from her post as chairman of the governors by a woman who stood against her and got fewer than 100 votes simply because she belonged to the party in power. That is quite wrong.

Still in Lancashire, I hear from governors and head teachers that where they have had chairmen of governors belonging to the Labour party they have been told not to press for further resources because those resources should go into other areas which were obviously of greater need. I could not agree more, but when it comes to televsion sets, videos and basic teaching equipment, surely they should be distributed on an equal basis. There are arguments for special teaching facilities for deprived areas, but they do not extend to painting walls and providing the basics in our schools. This should not happen, and we must prevent it in the future.

I quote another example, that of Aughton St. Michael's, a Church of England school. It was located on two sites, and an agreed proposal was put before a sub-committee of the Lancashire county council to locate the school on one site and to build two new classrooms. The chairman of the Lancashire education committee walked in and said, "Ladies and gentlemen, we are not doing this." All the governors and everyone else involved believed that the proposal was going through, but the whole thing was stopped there and then.

The introduction of peace studies is a typical example. Instead of allowing the subject to be dealt with in religious education, history or general periods, we are allowing politics to interfere. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) said, authorities such as Lancashire county council are doing one thing that should be stopped—putting politics before children.

We must have vision and that vision must include an increase in nursery education. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister has that in mind as an important objective as soon as resources are available. We have done a good job with the resources currently available. Let us now plan and build for the future the education system that we all want.

8.50 pm

* Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): As a Lancashire Member, I must first correct the impression given by the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) that the situation on governing bodies is a new development since Labour took control in 1981. When the Conservatives were in control at county hall they controlled every governing body in Burnley, although the majority of people there elected Labour county and borough councillors as well as a Labour Member of Parliament. I agree that there are problems with the present system, but criticism cannot be levelled at one particular political party. I agree that governing bodies should be more representative of the locality and that a county-wide basis is perhaps casting the net too wide.

I agree, too, that insufficient attention is paid to nursery education. Far more resources should be devoted to providing education facilities for the under-fives. Due to the foresight of the former county borough before local government reorganisation my area is fortunate in having good average provision in this respect, but I know that there is an acute shortage in many parts of the country.

In an age of new technology, a changing society and new developments in industry we must recognise that education and the leisure industries will have an increasing role in the future. We must accept that education will not end at the age of 16 or 18. People must be able to move in and out of education at all stages of their lives and resources must be made available to meet that demand, which will undoubtedly increase considerably in the years ahead

I do not speak as an education expert, although I was chairman of one governing body and served on many others before I was elected to the House last year. I agree entirely with my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes) that the morale of teaching staff is at a very low ebb. When I was chairman of a governing body I had the difficult task of choosing just one out of a very large number of applicants. I was also aware that many of those who were appointed were then unable to advance, due to the lack of movement. Voluntary redundancy terms have also had to be negotiated. Lancashire has recently had to announce that a further 200 voluntary redundancies will be necessary to keep within their budget constraints. It is regrettable that so many excellent teachers at all levels have had to leave the profession in recent years. The recent announcement is a further blow to education in the area.

My hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, South also mentioned the shortage of books. Only last weekend my 15-year-old daughter, who is studying for O-levels next year, asked me whether I could photocopy her English literature book, "A Man for all Seasons", because there were not enough copies and she had to return it on Monday. Having been unable to buy a copy on Saturday, I had to photocopy the book at 11 pm on Sunday so that she could give it back on Monday. Acute shortages of this sort must be rectified.

[Mr. Peter Pike]

Education will be a major growth area in the years ahead and it needs more, not fewer, resources.

8.55 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I must correct the view of the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham), who implied that all Conservative Members came from privileged backgrounds and thus could not understand the problems of people living in the slums. I do not wish to cast aspersions on the house in the east end in which my parents still live and in which I lived for many years, but it could scarcely be described as a palace. I certainly did not come from a privileged background. I had an ordinary state education and I am delighted to say that I sit very comfortably on the Conservative Benches. The Opposition should not judge us so harshly. We genuinely understand the difficulties of people being educated in areas with housing problems.

The Conservative election manifesto last year contained a commitment to improve education standards. Bolstered by the Education Act 1980 we are now moving towards that end. Parental choice and reorganisation of governing bodies will all help towards that. Naturally, however, people become concerned and frustrated when progress is not so rapid as one would wish. Indeed, some people believe that in some schools under some local authorities there is not a full commitment to improving standards. Happily, that is not the position in my constituency, which is blessed with excellent infant, junior and secondary school teachers. They are hard-working and dedicated people.

Since January, however, we have faced unexpected problems because in the past 12 months more than £1,500,000 worth of damage has been done to schools by arsonists. There are 59 schools in my constituency and 43 of them have been attacked. I have appealed to Essex county council to launch an immediate inquiry into the security of our schools and I am glad to see that it is taking up the matter urgently. The local police and fire services have reacted marvellously in seeking the co-operation of local headmasters, residents and other affected persons to try to prevent any further attacks.

I emphasise that there is little point in worrying about education provision while our schools are inadequately protected. It must be the responsibility of all local education authorities to provide adequate caretaking facilities, suitable alarm systems and evening patrol security cover. There can be no doubt that all parents support us in our desire to see improvements in the standards of education. They rightly adopt the maxim that parents cannot give their children brains, but they can at least give them the best start in life.

The pupil-teacher ratio between 1950 and 1980 has decreased by 20 per cent., which many would say has helped tremendously. However, I smile when I consider my education in the London borough of Newham. I was often in classes of 50 and the teachers still gave us excellent tuition and kept order to a high standard.

I wanted to talk about the excellent college of further education in Basildon, but, unfortunately, time does not allow.

Education is one of those subjects on which everyone considers himself an expert, if only on the premise that at some time we have all been to school. Advice comes from all quarters—the Government, the Opposition, myself, teachers, parents, the unions, and so on. But before putting our clever theories forward we should remember that it is the future of young lives that we are talking about and, ultimately, the future of the nation.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Most people in Britain can think of hundreds of reasons why we need to improve and extend education. Few can think of reasons why we need less education and why we should be contracting it. With all the arguments before the Secretary of State, the Chancellor should have had little chance to cut the education budget in his autumn statement. Nobody in Britain really wants tax cuts if they are at the expense of denying our children the opportunities that many of us have enjoyed.

The Secretary of State should have been like the stoat — able to mesmerise the floppy rabbit. Instead, the Chancellor has savaged the Secretary of State. Despite all the educational and social arguments, the Secretery of State has allowed his Department to be cut, and cut drastically.

It is amazing, having surrendered in that way, that he can table such a complacent amendment which talks about "developing the skills and abilities of all children"——

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Gentleman keeps on talking about a cut. There is not a cut, either in money terms or in real terms. The hon. Gentleman could not have heard what I said. There is a 6 per cent. increase in money against a forecast of 4·5 per cent. inflation and a 2 per cent. fall in school populations.

Mr. Bennett: I am sorry that the Secretary of State seems to believe his own statements. The figures show a rather different picture. There is an increase of £540 million in the expenditure for next year compared with this year — 4·1 per cent. extra expenditure. But given inflation of 4·5 per cent. that is a cut of 0·4 per cent. The Department's press release talks about opportunities for improving services if, for example, there are further economies in caretaking and cleaning costs. The protection of educational spending depends on teachers accepting a pay increase, which I am sure none of them will find acceptable. Less money will be available for education next year.

Therefore, the Government amendment is extremely complacent. It will not do anything at all to improve education opportunities for the handicapped child or for the child whose parents are on supplementary benefit. It will deny higher education opportunities to many students, particularly those referred to earlier, whose parents disapprove of their behaviour or just do not think that higher education is suitable for them. In the next 12 months the Government will deny educational opportunities to many people.

I also feel very aggrieved that once again the Government are turning to school meals for further economies. There have already been many exchanges in the Chamber about the number of children who end up having nothing more to eat than chips and gravy. As a result, many of them do not get the full benefit from their education. There is considerable evidence that children are not alert enough in schools because of the conditions under which they are brought up. I think that it is now a joke among school kids that school dinners will not spoil their appetites in between the bags of crisps. That is a reflection of the way in which we have allowed food standards in schools to diminish.

In the past 12 months the Secretary of State has been trying to convince the country that student numbers will fall over the next few years and that resources for universities, polytechnics and colleges of higher education may be cut by 1 or 2 per cent. However, the country has decisively rejected that. So the Secretary of State, instead of accepting that student numbers should be increasing, is trying to achieve his ambition of fewer students by imposing a savage cut in student support. That is probably one of the worst aspects of the way in which the education service is being cut following the autumn statement.

In the Secretary of State's press release he has accepted a £18 million cut in capital expenditure for education. Not only will education suffer as a result but the construction industry and the capital equipment manufacturers will also suffer. The Secretary of State's press release assumes that there is a possibility of an expansion in the number of 16 and 17-year-olds staying on in education. My hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster), the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) and others have argued the importance of encouraging young people to stay on in education instead of drifting away into youth training schemes and so on. But the reality is that many drift away from education because of the economic difficulties of staying on at school. If their parents are unemployed, it is extremely difficult for young people to face up to staying on at school, with the extra costs and problems that it causes for the parents. It is high time that a comprehensive system of income support was introduced for those 16 to 19-year-olds who choose to stay on in education instead of going on the dole, joining youth training schemes or taking jobs which are perhaps not suitable for them and consequently force others on to schemes.

The hon. Member for Bedfordshire, South-West said that the Government—I am pleased to say—have been able to increase the amount available for in-service training. But the increase in money is extremely small. Over the country as a whole, I think that it works out at about £35 per teacher available for in-service training. Given the Secretary of State's long shopping list—and I approve of much of it—to try to improve education standards, the amount of money available for in-service training is pitifully small. If we want to make a reality of ensuring that most primary schools teach science effectively and improving the curriculum in secondary schools, far more money must be available for in-service training. It is a question not of getting one or two specialists retrained, but of giving most teachers the opportunity at some point in each 12-month period to obtain some in-service training.

When the Secretary of State issued his press release there seemed to be many areas in which he was apologising for cuts. But there was no reference at all to many other areas. The hon. Members for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) drew attention to the Education Act 1980 and to the whole question of dealing with the special education needs of young people. The Education Act was right in principle, but it was a disgrace that the Government did not produce any resources to implement it. There are still no resources to implement it. Consequently, there are carefully prepared statements about the needs of those children but they only highlight the fact that there are not the resources to do the right thing.

The principles of the Act have been implemented, but we are denying them by failing to make the resources available. We do not have enough nursery places for handicapped children. When the legislation was going through the House everyone agreed that nursery education was important for all children, and that it was particularly important for handicapped children. We agreed that the education of handicapped children should begin as early as possible to help them overcome their handicaps.

No money is available to train teachers in ordinary schools to teach children with special needs. As a result, integration does not work. No money is available to adapt buildings. The Act places a duty on local education authorities to provide education for 16 to 19 year-old handicapped youngsters. Little provision is made for that age group. Any Secretary of State who tabled an amendment such as that on today's Order Paper should have on his conscience the fact that we are still doing far too little for handicapped youngsters in our education system. If we want to make the 1981 Act work we must find the resources.

The Department's press release says that the Secretary of State has asked the caretaking and cleaning services to pay for the extra books, the extra equipment and the repairs. It states:

> "If costs can be contained and savings made elsewhere—for example, in caretaking and cleaning costs—there should be scope for some further improvement in expenditure per pupil compared to 1982-83 levels".

The Secretary of State is being harsh if he expects the cleaners and caretakers to pay for improvements.

When I visit schools I am upset because I see pupils and teachers working hard. So often the lack of repairs and cleaning gives a wrong impression of a school. Many parents think that a school's standards are poor because of the lack of care and maintenance. We should now spend money on repairs and maintenance.

I often hear parents say that a school is in such a bad state that they should volunteer to do the cleaning or repairs themselves. We should not have to run our education system in that way, but I suspect that the Government are hoping that people will feel that the state maintains and repairs so inadequately that they should volunteer to do the work themselves.

The Government have talked about making a little more money available for books and other equipment. A critical HMI report was issued in 1981-82 and for a year there was a substantial increase in the money made available for books and materials. After that improvement, provision slipped in secondary schools and remained the same in primary schools.

What are the Government to do about school books? The rumour is that VAT will be imposed upon books. That is something for the Budget and it will be deplorable if it happens. It will have a crucial impact on the education budget for next year. A 15 per cent. increase in the price of books and other written materials means a 15 per cent. cut in expenditure. The Government must make it clear now that they will not impose VAT on educational materials and books. If they will not give that undertaking, I hope that the Minister of State will make it clear that he will compensate fully for any VAT on the education budget.

[Mr. Bennett]

There is another area in which the Government's record is deplorable—nursery education. There should be better nursery provision for the handicapped. Despite evidence of the great benefit to children and parents of nursery education, there are no proposals in the autumn statement and there is no money available for the expansion of nursery education.

A large number of our primary schools have spare cash and capacity. A large number of unemployed teachers could attend conversion courses on nursery education. Indeed, we have a large number of unemployed nursery nurses. We have a considerable opportunity to expand nursery education, yet the Government appear to be determined to let that opportunity pass. In the EC, especially in France and Germany, nursery education is taken for granted. Almost all three and four-year-olds in those countries enjoy nursery education. Few three or four-year-olds—in Britain enjoy nursery education.

I think that the Minister is becoming worried about the Government's education policy. He is obviously upset about the mounting evidence in the HMI reports about the lack of resources. However, rather than acting on those reports, he is keen to muzzle their publication. I hope that he will come clean and say that he is fully committed to publishing the HMI report. It was his Government who began publication of the reports. I hope that he will make it clear that he has no intention of reneging on that.

The Minister does not appear to be too happy about the Secretary of State's belief in market forces; he is beginning to realise its disastrous effect on teachers. The Secretary of State continues to tell the House that there is no shortage of teachers, so they must be well paid. I find a shortage of trained people for craft, design and technology in almost every school that I visit. Many schools are short of teachers of physics and chemistry. The Minister appreciates that it takes time to train teachers —at least three or four years. Indeed, it takes longer than that. Third and fourth-year pupils must decide whether they want to be teachers.

While the Secretary of State relies on market forces, the Minister has gone out of his way to draw attention to a new film aimed at recruiting more primary school teachers. There has been a nice press release, and I understand that the Minister is becoming worried about the supply of primary school teachers. I am glad that he has said that an additional 2,000 must be trained each year in the late 1980s.

However, if that film is shown to a group of sharp third and fourth-year students, they will immediately ask how much the teachers are paid and how long is a teacher's training. The Minister can tell us that a newly trained teacher receives about £7,239 a year. No doubt one pupil in the class will ask how long is the training for a policeman and how much does he earn. It takes much less time to train a policeman than it does to train a teacher, yet that policeman earns almost £3,000 more than a teacher. I am glad that the Minister is launching the film with such enthusiasm, but he must look carefully at the teachers' rates of pay. The market economy will be as great an influence on recruitment as the film will be.

I understood the Secretary of State to say in his speech that if the teachers made a further sacrifice next year there would be a little more equipment and a little more of this and that. Teachers are bitterly disappointed with the way in which they have been treated in this year's pay negotiations.

If the Secretary of State expects teachers to accept a 3 per cent. increase next year, he will be disappointed. They will not accept 3 per cent. next year and he must realise that he will have to find some extra resources. If he does not, he will destroy morale to such an extent that any attempt that he wants to make to improve standards—an attempt that I believe the whole House would like to see —will be abortive. That will happen because of his failure to pay teachers an adequate sum and to make it clear to them that the Government have a belief in them.

It is unfortunate that the Government and their predecessors have had a tendency in recent years to seek far more central control of education, especially of the curriculum. It is unfortunate that the Secretary of State is not prepared to trust teachers, local education authorities, parents and pupils to decide what is relevant to them. It seems that he does not trust local democracy and that he feels that it is far easier for a Secretary of State to be able to dictate to local schools what they should teach rather than cajoling and persuading them to opt for a certain course.

Foreign language teaching fails almost the majority of the population. Even when students have managed to achieve O-level French, many of them have an almost total inability to communicate in French.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the courses that are being run at the St. Martin's teacher training college at Lancaster, which have spread the capacity to speak French at all levels throughout Lancashire and Cumbria? They are outstandingly good courses and there are graded tests. Even the parents join in. These courses should be spread throughout the country.

Mr. Bennett: I am well aware that some imaginative work is being done in some areas but I am aware also that the standard of many who have passed through the education system and passed the tests is very low when it comes to a practical use of the language. Central direction will not improve upon that.

In many areas there is a major problem in motivating children to learn a foreign language. Perhaps it is all too easy for us to think that we can safely assume that many in other countries will speak English. In many areas there will be greater motivation to learn a language other than French as a second language. It would be far more sensible of the Government to say that all secondary schools should aim at teaching youngsters a second language. It is ridiculous for them to say which language it should be. It would be far better for a decision to be made locally on the most suitable second language to teach.

It is especially unfortunate that the number of youngsters who have learnt Russian has declined steeply in recent years. There are very few people who learn to speak Japanese while at school. However, the Japanese are only too willing to speak English while selling to us. If we want to sell to the Japanese, those engaged in the selling should speak Japanese. How many schools are teaching either Russian or Japanese?

I think that almost everyone is keen to see primary science developed but it is extremely difficult to say what elements of primary science should be developed in a particular locality. It is clear that the skills that need to be developed in primary schools can be catered for through physics, chemistry, biology and botany. It would be far more appropriate for an individual school, depending on the environment and the skills of the teachers, to choose how to teach primary science instead of having the subject imposed from the centre.

I have said many times in the House that we proudly claim in Government publications that we have a free education service without acknowledging that there is a series of charges that impose problems for youngsters from families on low incomes or living on benefits. I am only too conscious of the fact that, when I was a young teacher, it seemed simple to say to parents that 50p was needed for a trip for geography field work or a history visit, never stopping to think that other people in the school were doing the same. As a parent, I am well aware that kids come home from school and say, "Can I have this? Can I have that?" Some schools have to supplement the local authority provision by running Christmas fairs, raffles and other fund-raising efforts. Many of those programmes place financial pressures on low-income parents.

I have referred to the problem of 16 to 19-year-olds and the numbers who ought to go on the youth training schemes rather than stay at school. A grant would make a great deal of difference to those students.

The way in which the Government handled the announcement on student grants was appalling. The Government have not yet met the National Union of Students to discuss this round of student grants. Unilaterally, the Government announced the abolition of the minimum grant and the imposition of fees on people who will not receive any grant.

When I challenged the Secretary of State about the problems of those youngsters whose parents will not even fill out forms because they disapprove of their sons or daughters going into higher education, he said, "Give us a solution." There should have been full discussions with the NUS and an attempt to solve those problems before unilateral action was taken.

There has been an amazing about-turn by the Conservative party. The Prime Minister, when in opposition, said that she wanted students to be independent of their parents. Last year and this year the Government moved massively in the opposite direction and have made increasing numbers of students more dependent on their parents.

I should have liked to have the time to discuss further education a little more. The House should return to this subject, to which it gives far too little attention.

Mr. Parris rose——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I shall not give way now.

We pressed the Secretary of State to tell us whether he was now satisfied that a compromise had been worked out between the local authorities and the MSC. We were not sure whether the right hon. Gentleman was saying that he was not satisfied with the compromise, or was saying that at that stage in the debate he did not want to say anything. The Under-Secretary of State should tell the House whether he is satisfied that a compromise has been worked out and where he sees it going. The proposals to take from the colleges 30 per cent. of the work in non-advanced further education which is vocationally orientated and give it to the MSC caused a great deal of ill-will in the colleges. That change seemed to be unnecessary.

I have no evidence that employers are dissatisfied with what the colleges are able to do. Many employers want the colleges to do more and to have better equipment, but basically they are not dissatisfied with what the colleges are going to do. That is another example of the way in which the Government want to remove people's democratic opportunities to influence colleges and hand the work to the MSC, which is in no way accountable to local democracy even though, to a certain extent—not all that great—it is accountable to Ministers. I strongly argue that we want clear information about how the Government see developments.

The Government should spend a bit more time looking at what has happened to apprenticeship schemes. Such schemes were crucial in many instances to feeding people through the process of further education into higher education. Because of the decimation of industry and the even greater destruction of apprenticeship courses, the approach through further education into higher education has disappeared. Much more time should be given to debating that aspect.

The complacency of the Secretary of State as shown in the amendment sums up his position. It seems that, at the end of his political career, he is losing his opportunities. [HON. MEMBERS: "Many more years".] Many more years? Well, let us see. It was my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) who reminded the House that the Secretary of State's career started with the high-rise flats. He went on to reorganise the Health Service. He was enthusiastic about monetarism in the 1970 to 1979 period. He was at the Department of Industry when he pretty well decimated British industry. He was the man who brought Ian MacGregor to this country. I do not believe that he can be pleased about that. In the Department of Education and Science he had an opportunity to repent of some of the crises that he created.

Instead of setting about doing what is necessary for education—many people agree with what the Secretary of State has been saying about education—he has failed to put the money where he has put his words. That is a fundamental failure. It is no good talking about raising educational standards, expanding educational opportunity or giving a fair deal to the handicapped unless the Government come up with the money. That is the problem. The Government's record in education has been one of cuts and a failure to take the opportunities to expand education when the money was available from North sea oil to do so.

We have had a tragic missed opportunity, but we shall not know what opportunities the country has missed in education until the Japanese come selling to us. I suggest that the House should vote for our motion and decisively reject the amendment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): Perhaps I should start by telling the House about a matter of particular pride for Conservative Members. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently celebrated the 25th anniversary of his appointment to the Front Bench of our party.

This has been a most interesting, intriguing and, at times, strange debate. We have had speeches from my hon. Friends the Members for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel), for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths), for

[Mr. Bob Dunn]

Salisbury (Mr. Key), for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden), for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Carttiss), for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris), for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey), for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) and for Basildon (Mr. Amess). We have had a strange assortment of speeches from Opposition Members, from the hon. Members for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster), for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes), for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan), for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham), for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) and for Burnley (Mr. Pike). I apologise for sounding like a railway announcer.

We hoped for great things during the course of the debate. The hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice), on his appointment to the Opposition Front Bench, promised us last November a Supply day on education. He mentioned it once, twice or three further times, but we heard no more about it. That was promised and threatened over the past 12 months, but after today's performance and the general lack of commitment by the Opposition in the debate I rather suspect that the hon. Member for Durham, North wished that he had not bothered.

We have been here for the whole afternoon and we have listened with interest, care, calm and courtesy. As one of the nicest men in this place, may I say that I had hoped for rather more than we received. This debate was to be the showpiece. If it was the showpiece, I should love to see the Rolls-Royce model.

Mr. Radice: The hon. Member may have forgotten that at 6.53 pm on Tuesday 3 April 1984 he made a speech. His memory has plainly just gone.

Mr. Dunn: I remember the speech well. It was one of the best I ever made. As I am starting in a relatively good frame of mind, I should like to congratulate the hon. Member on his re-election to the shadow Cabinet. I am delighted that he was reappointed to the education brief. I am also pleased that he has rejected the invitation to join the alliance. I am delighted that he intends to stay in his own party to fight for the cause in which he believes, at least for the time being.

When the debate started, I expected a tremendous barrage of speeches, comments and points of view and, in truth, there have been many good speeches and sensible comments. But I must say, because I feel that I should, that there have been no speeches from the Social Democratic party and only one from the Liberal party. I am so disappointed——

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): But Conservative Members usually complain if more alliance speakers are called.

Mr. Dunn: Of course I am complaining. This is an Opposition day. If education is so important to the alliance, it is a pity that more members of it were not here during the day. Therefore, Conservative Members are more impressed by the eloquence of absent Members than by the nature of the speeches that have been made.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be an enormous improvement to many debates if there were no speeches from the Social Democratic party and the Liberal party?

Mr. Dunn: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, but as we are approaching Christmas we must express charity and good will.

I have said that the Department of Education and Science can be a power for extreme good and, occasionally, for evil. In the five years that we have been in government that Department, under two Secretaries of State, has been a power for enormous good, dynamism and improvement in the education service. I remember a distant time when there was, in the words of one of my young son's books, a "wicked witch" called Shirley Williams who occupied the Department of Education and Science and did disastrous things. Her actions were supported by Opposition Members, veterans such as the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and others whose constituencies I have forgotten. During that time, there was an all-out assault on good standards and centres of excellence. Much of the blame for some of the faults in the maintained education service lie absolutely and resolutely at the doorstep of the Labour party.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth referred to the great debate started by the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan). At that time we all wondered why the right hon. Gentleman did what he did. He started the great debate, and there were headlines in the papers for about half a day. Then nothing happened. If one looks back at the course of education history and attempts to establish the high points of Socialist education policy as well as those of the Conservative party, one finds that at the time of that great debate there was not even a bang, but a whisper — [HON. MEMBERS: "A whimper."] Perhaps it was a whimper, or a Wimpy. But the fact is that nothing was done by the Labour party in many years of Socialist Government of which we and, I suspect, Labour Members can be proud.

In a recent debate the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) promised that expenditure on health by a future Labour Government, if ever there were one, would increase by 3 per cent. That amounts to about £500 million in cash terms. The hon. Member for Oldham, West said that that was the bottom line, which I assume is the minimum amount by which the Labour Government would increase expenditure. The hon. Member for Durham, North was canny when he was asked a question on expenditure by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in the House on 8 November. My right hon. Friend said that the hon. Gentleman

"must tell the House and the country whether he will commit a future Labour Government, if there ever is one, to provide more money for education via the local education authorities."—[Official Report, 8 November 1984; Vol. 67, c. 310.]

In reply, the hon. Member for Durham, North talked about the relativities of defence and education expenditure. To be fair, the hon. Gentleman was caught on the hop. My right hon. Friend posed the same question again today and we received the same answer. I accept that expenditure would increase under Labour, but by how much?

Mr. Radice rose——

Mr. Dunn: Let me finish the question first. By £100 million? By £500 million? Today, the hon. Gentleman gave a list of demands for more expenditure on this, that and the other and things yet to be thought of. The hon. Gentleman must ultimately put a figure on it.

Mr. Radice: There will probably be some time before the next election and I seem to remember that the Conservative party, when in opposition, did not put a figure to any of its plans until just before the general election. Indeed, I do not think that it gave any figures at all. We are committed to spending more on education. I shall certainly not give a precise commitment at this stage. I have no intention of doing that.

Mr. Dunn: I assume, therefore, that the hon. Member for Oldham, West is in the doghouse as he has done just that. If the hon. Member for Durham, North chooses not to answer the question as I should like, so be it, but I reserve the right to refer to it in future, and I shall.

The hon. Member for Bishop Auckland made a reasoned speech and some interesting points in a telling way. He asked me to comment on the concordat between the Manpower Services Commission and the local authority associations about the proposals on training for jobs. The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) also referred to it. I understand that the chairman of the MSC has reached an agreement with the education leaders of the local authority associations which I understand the associations have endorsed. The Government welcome that outcome and are grateful for the co-operation that is now offered by the local authority associations. As the House knows, that will be in the interests of young people. I am sure that both sides of the House are delighted with that result.

I must thank the hon. Member for Durham, North for causing me to be on the front page of The Times Educational Supplement for five weeks running. He mentioned the HMI expenditure report. I should like to reiterate what my right hon. Friend said earlier today. We have no intention of varying the present and long-standing arrangements for securing the professional independence of Her Majesty's inspectorate. The practice of publishing HMI reports, for which we take credit, is new and we should all continue to think about how they can be used to the greatest benefit of the education service. That is especially true of the annual report on the effects of local authority expenditure policies.

My right hon. Friend warned about the dangers of over-simplification. I can understand why the press restricts itself to headlines about shortages of resources, but it is less easy to know why, despite all that has been said, Opposition Members insist on saying that levels of provision have got worse during the Government's term of office and that spending much more would automatically improve the quality of education in schools.

The most recent HMI expenditure report noted an overall improvement in resource levels and made it quite clear that the quality of teaching, the proper indentification of pupil needs and the effective management of resources are essential complements to the provision of resources in securing good education.

The hon. Member for St. Helen's, North—

Mr. Bermingham: South.

Mr. Dunn: East or West, it does not really matter—commented on the absence of evidence from the past on which to make a comparative judgment. He did not hear my right hon. Friend observe that we did not have published HMI reports from earlier years so we could not know how low the base line had been in earlier years. We should remember that it was a Conservative Secretary of State who decided to publish HMI reports.

Mr. Bermingham: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, but would he not accept that we are not interested in comparisons? We are interested not in the past but in the future. We are commenting on the deficiencies shown in the reports, in the hope that the Government will repair them and that future reports will show fewer deficiencies.

Mr. Dunn: We are conscious of that point. My point is that, if some of the problems had particularly deep historical roots, earlier publications would have revealed them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West made some glowing remarks in my absence. I am sorry that I was not here, because it is always nice to be complimented. He also referred to the decision of the Labour-controlled Derbyshire county council to call in its writing paper and envelopes so that they could be overprinted with the slogan "nuclear-free zone". I understand from a report in the Daily Star of 12 November that such an action would involve the authority in the expenditure of about £50,000. [HON. MEMBERS: "Disgraceful."] The article states:

"Defending what he claims to be a non-political decision, education committee chairman Frank Revel says 'The money we are spending is just a drop in the ocean'".

In Derbyshire, £50,000 is nearly 4 per cent. of total expenditure on school books in 1983-84. I am prepared to give way to the hon. Member for Durham, North so that he can join me in condemning such a gross abuse of expenditure. I see that the hon. Gentleman does not wish to intervene. That is game, set and match to me.

Mr. Buchan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dunn: In my part of the world we have an expression——

Hon. Members: Give way.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister sought to give way to another hon. Member, not to the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan).

Mr. Dunn: I am sure that the hon. Member for Paisley, South will not mind if I say that I would rather talk to the organ-grinder.

Mr. Buchan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dunn: I am only a tenth of the way through my speech.

Mr. Buchan: The hon. Member has not said anything yet.

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Gentleman must listen patiently.

The Government's plans for local authority expenditure on education for 1985-86 are consistent with our commitment further to improve standards of attainment by pupils. It is up to the LEAs to make the best use of the substantial resources available to them. That means taking every opportunity to redeploy resources as school rolls fall.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Will the hon. Gentleman not accept that this year, in practice, local authorities have had to borrow from other areas of the rate support grant some 12 per cent. to subsidise education budgets and that if they are to balance their books they must make substantial cuts in education or continue to redirect resources intended for other areas such as personal social services?

Mr. Dunn: I am aware of the problems of LEAs in connection with the competing calls on limited sums of money. I have been a member of a local authority myself —the London borough of Southwark. It is essential to understand that the concern of LEAs should be to get the best value for money. If that means that local authorities — whether Labour or Conservative — will consider alternative means of making the same pound stretch further, more power to their elbow. I would have quoted figures to show the advantages of privatisation, but with only 10 minutes left, and 90 per cent. of my speech still to come, I shall probably not reach them.

The hon. Member for Blackley made an interesting speech, which confused me a little, about the problems of Manchester. I accept that Manchester, like any inner-city area, has problems. None the less, Manchester has got to grips with the problems of surplus places and has taken some schools out of use. The city of Manchester, which is controlled by the Labour party, has a duty to go further and consider the benefits of privatisation. It should consider carefully the advantage to the ratepayer. Labour Members talk about opinion polls which say this, or say that so many ILEA people say that; we have never had an opinion poll of the ratepayers. Ratepayers are a much-denied, much-deluded and much-abused category of people, and the Labour party does not take their views into account, as was shown by the example of Derbyshire.

Mr. Radice: What will the Minister do about Norfolk?

Mr. Dunn: It is a very flat county, Norfolk, but I hope to go there some day and examine the provisions.

Mr. Radice: I am glad that the Minister will consider visiting Norfolk some day. I was there the week before last and I visited the schools whose provisions the HMI criticised. The Minister and the Secretary of State must answer this question: when and how will they provide the resources that are necessary to improve educational provision in Norfolk?

Mr. Dunn: The chairman of Norfolk education authority made it plain that she intends to examine the report with interest and will use it as and when she can. Someone said earlier that my actions in relation to the HMI showed that I was trying to shoot the messenger. The reverse is true. We have given the messenger some arms. The Labour Government did not publish HMI reports, and one wonders whether they would have published these.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich asked about political appointments of head teachers or teaching staff. I must speak for all hon. Members when I condemn those occasions when people are appointed to positions of responsibility in local education authorities because they are good politicians rather than being good for the jobs to which they are appointed. I am sure that I speak for Labour Members as well as Conservative Members.

My hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth mentioned teacher appraisal. I welcome his remarks and his support for the objective assessment of teacher competence at various stages in a teacher's career. The facts are already known to the teachers. The Secretary of State and I must now create a way of gathering those facts objectively and rewarding those who need to be rewarded, or helping those who need to be helped, in the best way possible through the local education authority.

New teachers entering the profession must be adequately trained and suitable for the demanding task that faces them. Our White Paper entitled "Teaching Quality" announced proposals to strengthen initial teacher training. I am pleased to say that they have been implemented. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales have issued rigorous criteria for the approval of initial teacher training courses, and have established a council for the accreditation of teacher education to examine each course against those criteria. The House will know that the council started work in September and is expected to complete its first review of courses three or four years from now.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West referred to the advantages of in-service training. The Government welcome in-service training in whatever level it is adopted, if it is to the benefit of pupils and teachers. However, we must address a question to those who organise and take part in in-service training. At the end of the training, do the people who have taken part know more and react better, and have they gained from the experience of undergoing in-service training? If the answer to that question is yes, then in-service training is adequate and worthwhile, and must be to the benefit of all concerned.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth referred to the problems caused by the European Court's decision to end corporal punishment in schools. As the House will know, in the Gracious Speech we announced a forthcoming Bill to secure compliance with the ruling of the European Court of Human Rights of February 1982, that parents who hold a philosophical conviction against corporal punishment should be entitled to have that conviction respected. The Government are bound by that ruling, and can do no other than give effect to it. The choice was between abolishing corporal punishment altogether and creating a system giving parents an option about its use.

Several hon. Members have referred to peace studies. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made clear his views to the National Council of Women of Britain on 3 March this year. He argued then that, as pupils mature, they should be encouraged to apply their reasoning powers to important issues of the day, including such questions as the morality of war, the conditions that lie behind war, and so on. No matter what standards we set, and what guidelines are laid down by local education authorities, the problem of the perverse teacher in the classroom with 23 children can never be eliminated. We must place our trust in the tolerance and professionalism of the teachers. I hope that those who might seek to abuse their privileged position will refrain from doing so. That must be right.

Mr. Buchan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dunn: No.

Mr. Buchan: What about VAT on books?

Mr. Dunn: VAT on books is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett rose——

Mr. Dunn: I have a right in a free society to make my own speech in the way that I choose.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has considered the Green Paper on parental influence in schools. We believe that governors have a greater role and a greater sense of stewardship than they had previously. It is up to the governers, either with the new powers—whatever they turn out to be — or with existing conventions, to operate within their schools, to become familiar with the teaching practices and activities that take place in schools. If more governors went round the premises for which they were appointed, some of the errors and abuses referred to by some of my hon. Friends would not take place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth also referred to religious education in schools. Religious education will always have a vital part to play in the education of all our children. The religious education provisions of the Education Act 1944 are part of a settlement between the churches and the state, which underpin that Act. We have no plans to amend the 1944 Act.

The hon. Member for Blackley referred to a number of problems in Manchester, especially the problems of food and diet for the poor, and I shall write to him about that.

Socialism has failed in this debate. The Labour Opposition will put it to the vote, but will undoubtedly lose. Therefore, I urge my hon. Friends to vote for the Government's amendment and against the motion put down by the Opposition.

Resolved,

That this House believes that the future of this nation depends on developing the skills and abilities of all children; congratulates Her Majesty's Government on its policies for raising standards of education for all abilities by action on the curriculum, examinations and teaching quality; and welcomes Her Majesty's Government's policies for securing the most effective use of the substantial resources available for the benefit of the education service.

PETITIONS

Infantry Training Depot, Crickhowell

10.14 pm

Mr. Tom Hooson (Brecon and Radnor): I rise to present a petition by Crickhowell, Cwmdu, Llangattock, Llangenni and Llangynidr community councils in the county of Powys. Their grievance concerns the announced intention of the Secretary of State for Defence to phase out the infantry training depot of the Prince of Wales division at Cwrt y Gollen, Crickhowell, by 1986.

The petitioners are 44 community councillors and they pray that the House will prevent this step. Being myself resident in the immediate vicinity, I know that they truly reflect the strong desire of the area to retain the Army as a good neighbour.

In addition, the councillors undoubtedly speak for Wales. During the highly publicised speculation about the future of Cwrt y Gollen through the early summer months, we attracted widespread support for the depot throughout the Principality.

Ever since Agincourt, Wales has provided infantry soldiers for the British Army, yet today Cwrt y Gollen is the sole remaining Army training depot in Wales. That powerful factor of the Welsh nation's historic identification with the Army must be added to the councillors' concern at the impact of closure on the local economy.

The petitioners pray that Cwrt y Gollen will be retained as a military depot, and we must hope that all possibilities, including its use by the Territorial Army and the other armed services, will be explored.

To lie upon the Table.

PETITION

Drug Addiction

10.15 pm

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and that of the House, I beg leave to present a petition on behalf of my constituents, mainly in the Possilpark district of my constituency, and on behalf of the residents of the Ruchill area in the adjoining constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen). Indeed, he wishes to associate himself with the petition.

The residents of those districts and indeed, of the Glasgow area, are very perturbed about the problem of drug addiction. Indeed, the first name on the petition is that of Mrs. McHugh, whose son Derek tragically died only a few months ago from a drug overdose. The petition urges the Government to do something about the problem and to curb the activities of drug traffickers in our cities. It states:

To the honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled, the Humble Petition of the residents of Possilpark, Ruchill, and Glasgow showeth

That we are extremely concerned about the level of drug addiction within our communities.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will urge Her Majesty's Government to introduce more drastic measures to deal with the problem of drug abuse and will curtail the activities of drug dealers in this country;

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

I beg leave to present the Petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Ethiopia

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Major.]

10.16 pm

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): As the House may know, I, together with the hon. Members for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) and for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood)—both of whom, Mr. Speaker, I know wish to catch your eye later—returned late on Sunday after a six-day fact-finding visit to Ethiopia, which included much travelling in drought-stricken areas, including Tigre and Wollo, extensive discussions with senior members of the Ethiopian Administration, the Ethiopian relief organisation, and with the United Nations and other non-governmental organisations such as the World Food Programme, field directors and relief workers of voluntary organisations such as Oxfam, the Save the Children Fund and the Red Cross.

In the limited time available to me, I do not intend to attempt to describe the consequences of the famine. It is not a famine of biblical proportions; it is worse—it is a holocaust of hunger. There is mile after mile of burnt, brown, barren land that has been without rain for four years. The rivers are dry and local supplies of food are long since exhausted. What should now be a season of harvest is a time of despair and desperation. It is difficult adequately to describe the dimensions of the disaster and I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development is shortly going to Ethiopia to see for himself that holocaust of hunger.

As the world community has at last awakened to the reality of the drought, there is now some hope. Food is starting to reach those in need. The Ethiopian relief agency, the RRC, with the now total support of the Ethiopian Government is moving heaven and earth to get the most desperately needed supplies of food up to northern Ethiopia and the Ethiopian authorities are making every effort to feed everyone, wherever they might be.

The voluntary agencies, their field officers and relief workers are doing fantastic work. I am certain that every penny that has been donated to Oxfam, the Save the Children Fund, the Red Cross, CAFOD and other relief agencies is being put to the best possible use. The grain that Oxfam sent to Ethiopia, together with grain donated by British farmers in the "Send a Tonne" appeal was unloaded in record time and is now being distributed to those in need.

Oxfam field workers in Ethiopia are giving invaluable help and guidance. The Save the Children Fund is giving the chance of life to thousands of children and their mothers. At Korem alone, the Save the Children Fund is daily feeding about 18,000 small children and their mothers. The Ethiopian Minister of Health, who is responsible for co-ordinating Ethiopian relief operations, asked us to go to see him and personally requested us to pass on to the people of Britain the sincere and heartfelt thanks of the people of Ethiopia for all that the British people have done so far in sending funds and food.

There is no doubt that the recent actions by the British Government have served as a catalyst for action. The arrival of the RAF Hercules at Addis Ababa was a visible sign that Britain and the rest of the world were coming to help. The arrival of the RAF shamed Russia and the eastern bloc into responding. The RAF is doing fantastic work ferrying food to areas which until recently were without any food whatsoever. Its professionalism is outstanding. I hope that the RAF will be able to stay in Ethiopia until all urgent needs are met.

I am conscious of the many other practical ways in which Britain is helping both with food and funds. I acknowledge the leadership that the Prime Minister has given in the Council of Ministers in galvanising the European Community into action. I appreciate the considerable efforts by the Minister for Overseas Development both here and in Europe to stimulate as much help as possible.

Food is now getting to people in need in Ethiopia, albeit in small quantities. There is now some hope, but there is also considerable apprehension that what needs to be a consistent 18-month campaign may become on 18-day wonder once it is no longer the focus of the world's attention. There is apprehension that, unless sufficient supplies of food are sustained, thousands upon thousands of men, women, mothers, fathers and children will die early next year. They will starve to death as grain supplies are once again exhausted.

The Save the Children Fund and other relief agencies estimate that people in the drought-stricken areas of Ethiopia require a further 520,000 tonnes of grain to save the millions of lives at risk until next year's harvest. That is about 60,000 tonnes a month, which is only half the rations recommended by the United Nations. At best it is only half a loaf a day per person.

As of last week, only 30 per cent. of that food had been pledged by the world community. Much more will have to be found if thousands are not to die. The figures that the Minister has been given—I suspect by the World Food Programme—of the anticipated arrivals of grain over the next few months are wrong and bear no relation to the information that we gained in Addis Ababa last weekend.

That grain can come only from the West. Those who, like myself, campaigned vigorously for Britain's membership of the European Community did so in the firm belief that Britain and a united Europe could give the world a lead. This year Europe enjoyed a record grain harvest. Our granaries are groaning with grain. Literally millions of tonnes lie in the intervention stores. The people of Britain will not forgive us if we hoard surplus grain here when, elsewhere, thousands are dying simply for the need of such grain.

The farmers have already been paid for the grain in intervention. The only budgetary consideration is the difference between the cost of storing the grain and the cost of shipping it to Ethiopia. The signs are that it costs more to store.

Jim O'Keefe, the President of the European Community, spoke in Brussels last week of thousands dying once all budgetary possibilities were exhausted. He said:

> "We may face a situation in March or April this year when, despite our best efforts, and having exhausted all the possibilities within the Community budget, hundreds of thousands of people are dying."

All that appears to be in danger of being exhausted is the will and resolve of the politicians who control the European Community, and the bureaucrats who administer it, to cut the red tape in accordance with the overwhelming will of the people in the European Community that our surplus grain should be pledged in whatever quantity necessary to save the starving. Britain should take a further lead.

Ten years ago, Ethiopia experienced drought and famine. The world said, "Never again." It has happened again. Ten years ago, at the world food conference in Rome, Kissinger said that within a decade no child in the world need go to bed hungry. A decade later we witness children dying and starving for want of food.

Ethiopia and other African countries are hungry for change. That change can come only if we and others provide sufficient development aid to assist agriculture in Ethiopia and elsewhere in Africa, so as to enable farmers to grow more food to tackle hunger. If we do not do this we shall find that thousands more die from starvation each and every year.

Any cut in Britain's overseas development budget will be a shortsighted and retrograde step. If anyone asks why we should help to take on the responsibility, the answer is simply that we are, at heart, a Christian people and a Christian nation.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I am grateful for the opportunity to reinforce the points made by the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry). I shall never forget the sights that I saw last Thursday and Friday in Ethiopia. They will live with me for the remainder of my life.

I plead with the Minister to accept that the Government must make it quite clear, as soon as possible, that the world will produce sufficient grain to meet the needs of Ethiopia. Only 30 per cent. of Ethiopia's requirements have been offered by donor countries. It is essential that the countries with a food surplus should quickly commit themselves to ensuring that the needs of Ethiopia are met.

It is important to ensure that supplies are delivered regularly during the next 12 months and that we do not find that nothing is delivered in one month, which means that the people of Ethiopia will go short for a month.

The tragedy of Ethiopia is that the famine hits the headlines only when the media can show skeletal children on the television screen. There was a drastic famine around Korem in 1965. Some have suggested that one in two people died. Most of us know that in 1973, 250,000 died in Ethiopia because of the famine.

As the hon. Member for Banbury informed us, everyone said that that could never happen again. Yet, 10 years later, it is happening again. I shall be haunted by the fact that in five or six years it could happen again. We must examine the situation in Korem. It is a vast dust-bowl area, yet it could be a productive agricultural region. At Alomata, we have been assured there is an adequate water supply just 17m below the surface which could turn the whole area into a fertile land.

That area is capable of ensuring that, at least in that one area of Ethiopia, no further famines must be endured. It should not be beyond our ability and imagination to ensure that we give sufficient aid to Ethiopia which enables simple pumping and simple drilling to turn it into a food-producing area.

I plead with the Minister to ensure that Ethiopia receives the short-term aid that it needs, that it is delivered in an even flow and, above all, that Britain makes certain that it never happens again. We should never again be faced with the pictures of horror that will haunt us for years to come. We must ensure that we carry out the aid that I have outlined.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in this important debate. I appreciate the Minister's announcement that he will view the scenes for himself. I asked him to do that early in the year, but he did not think it appropriate.

When the Minister visits Ethiopia, he will see what we are accustomed to seeing on our television screens night after night—the individual horrors. However, he will also see what our screens do not portray, which is the scale of difficulties confronting the people in the 14 affected provinces in Ethiopia and the wider areas of Saharan Africa. The Minister will appreciate that the scale of the disaster is grander and wider than can possibly be portrayed on television.

The position in Ethiopia has been bad for almost 10 years. Indeed, the area has been accustomed to food shortages during that time. I know that during the past two years the Government have taken action to help Tigre and other provinces. I have no doubt that the Minister will return from Ethiopia with the same conclusions as we did —that it is all too little, too late.

The estimates that are made by the Ethiopian Government and the relief agencies suggest that between 7 million and 10 million people are in the drought-affected areas, 43 per cent. of whom are children younger than 14 years of age. The calculation of the relief and rehabilitation commission, which is the Ethiopian Government authority dealing with the crisis, is that 520,000 tonnes of food will be required. That calculation is based on a United Nations figure which has been divided by 50 per cent. I hope that the Minister will bear that figure in mind when he has discussions with the authorities in Ethiopia. As the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) said, the Ethiopian authorities have received only 30 per cent. of the required essential grain commitment to date.

If the statement of the relief and rehabilitation commission that we heard on Saturday is true, there is a possibility that, far from Assab being clogged up, there will be nothing to shift within the next few days if the grain shipments do not arrive. An efficient delivery system is operating from the port and the internal distribution system is well primed with food. The food has been taken from the ports up country to the stores and distribution centres. Unfortunately, further supplies are not on the horizon in supply ships to the extent and in the quantities that are needed. The fear was expressed on Saturday that the grain will not be delivered regularly to enable the excellent efforts of the Royal Air Force to be implemented in moving the grain up country in a regular and orderly manner.

The relief agencies have estimated that about 600,000 tonnes of food supplies will be needed over the next 12 to 18 months. The bulk deliveries that will have to be made will cost a good deal less than the possible cut of £106 million in the budget of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office that has been discussed. We do not have to meet the entire cost ourselves, because I think that we should act in concert with our allies in the European Community, America and Australia. However, I think that we should take a lead in delivering the relief from the international community that will prevent the risk of almost 900,000 avoidable deaths. That number of deaths would be intolerable and I hope that the Minister will return from Ethiopia and do everything that he can to prevent avoidable deaths.

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): The House has listened carefully to the brief but moving and vivid speeches of my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) and the hon. Members for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) and for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood). I think that everyone will agree that it is right to have the debate. It will be a short debate, but in the quarter of an hour that has passed we have heard some valuable contributions. I shall do my best to answer the questions and respond to the issues that have been raised, but it is not possible to present the full picture within the time imposed by an Adjournment debate.

As the House knows, I hope to go to Ethiopia to see the situation for myself. During my visit I shall meet representatives of the Ethiopian Government and of those who are serving so admirably with the voluntary agencies, the members of our splendid Royal Air Force team and our ambassador and his staff, who are all serving us and the people of Ethiopia extremely well. Most importantly, I shall see for myself the sights that have moved us so deeply in the past few weeks and months.

The debate has been primarily about the need for food and it is that to which I shall address my remarks principally. Before doing so I shall make a few comments about the past, which has been discussed a good deal. It is argued that we have not done enough to help Ethiopia since 1974 and that what we have done both directly and through the multilateral agencies has served only to sustain an iniquitous system and wrong-headed policies. The lack of aid and the supply of it are blamed as contributing to the present disaster.

It is true that we have not felt able to run a full-scale development programme in Ethiopia, and I shall say why. In the troubled province of the Tigré we supported an agricultural development project but, by 1976, difficulties with politics and security—one of our people was shot — made it seem pointless to continue. Ethiopia's agricultural policies brought declining incentives to peasant producers, marketing controls that discouraged production and the allocation of scarce resources to state farms that produced little of the nation's food. There were also human rights problems. We have however continued with what bilateral assistance we could to help with training and the short-term benefits of disaster relief and food aid. Contrary to the impression sometimes given by the media, we have given Ethiopia more help to combat famine in the last few years than we have given to any other country. This has been given as disaster relief, food aid, and our share in food and emergency aid from the Community. The fact remains that the need is dire, and it must be met.

The question of the use of European food surpluses as food aid has been raised, and I think that we all know that it is in the minds of many members of the public. The existence of these food stocks in the European Community naturally leads people to expect a generous response with food aid in emergencies. In the last 12 months, 72,000 tonnes of grain have been delivered under the Community's food aid programme to Ethiopia. A further 10,000 tonnes of grain will arrive next month, and 25,000 tonnes for food for work projects will arrive in two shipments in February and April next year. The House will be pleased to hear also that the Commission announced yesterday a new commitment of 25,000 tonnes which will arrive next month. The Commission is planning now to send an average of 10,000 tonnes a month, including the amounts already pledged, to Ethiopia during 1985.

Inevitably, that aid costs money. It is sometimes said — it was said this morning on the BBC — that it is cheaper to send grain surpluses as food aid than to store them. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury has argued that point, but it is not really true. The grain has been brought into store, but it would normally be sold, as my hon. Friend acknowledged, when market conditions allowed. If the grain is sent as food aid, it is obviously no longer available for sale, and the Community's taxpayers foot the bill. The grain has to be both paid for and shipped, and the internal distribution costs have to be met. In the present circumstances in Ethiopia, donors have to take a major responsibility for the internal as well as foreign exchange costs. The cost of buying and delivering a tonne of grain as food aid from Europe to the famine areas in Ethiopia is £250 — more than 10 times the annual storage cost, which the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food put at £20 a year. The needs of Ethiopia and other drought-affected African countries must be met, but there are substantial costs, and the Community cannot bear the burden alone. I do not think that anyone expects the Community to do so. The United States has recently pledged 130,000 tonnes, the Canadians 80,000 tonnes this year and the Australians 25,000 tonnes. The Community's relief effort must therefore be seen as part of the international response by many donors. The relief commissioner, whom I saw a day or two ago on his way back from the United States, had been profoundly moved by the response in North America. A substantial international effort is being mounted, and that is exactly what is needed.

The World Food Programme reports that arrivals at Assab are subject to some uncertainty, but it puts them provisionally at 61,000 tonnes in December, 53,000 tonnes in January and 57,000 tonnes in February. Forecasts of arrivals at Djibouti and Massawa are not available in any detail, but it is probable that additional supplies, including the additional 25,000 tonnes from the European Community, will arrive through those ports as well as the supplies diverted from Assab. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury has challenged those World Food Programme figures. Obviously, that is something into which I shall look carefully.

I am determined that the momentum generated within the Community will not be lost during the course of next year. I welcome the Commission's intention to continue substantial shipments to Ethiopia throughout 1985. I am pressing for the urgent needs of drought-affected areas to take priority in 1985 over regular food aid programmes and for early decisions on the allocation of the 1985 programme.

I am glad that the aid given by the Community and other Western donors has stimulated the Soviet Union and its allies into providing help, particularly with transport. We should remember that their provision of military equipment and advice has encouraged the ravages of civil war, which have added to the problems of the region. We do not support the secessionist groups and do not wish to interfere in Ethiopia's politics, but I urge the Ethiopian Government and those who oppose them to set aside their differences and to co-operate in bringing relief to the thousands who face death by starvation. We pledge ourselves to help the Government and people of Ethiopia in this task and to do so in close co-operation with the other donors, multilateral bodies and voluntary agencies who share this objective. The responsibility for co-ordinating these efforts rests largely and inevitably with the Government of Ethiopia and I am glad that the Secretary-General of the United Nations has appointed a co-ordinator to assist them. We wish Mr. Jansson every success in this important work.

Turning to the future, we must look to the multilateral agencies, and in particular the European Community, for the kind of assistance that can help avert further disasters. The pattern of negotiation agreed under the Lomé convention enables the Community to achieve the right context for aid much more effectively than could be done by a single donor. The pragmatic approach taken by the Ethiopean Government to famine relief makes me hope that a similar approach can be adopted to longer-term agricultural development. I understand that the latest discussions between the Government of Ethiopia and the World Bank have shown encouraging signs of that. The problems of Ethiopia have to be seen in the context of famine and the threat of famine elsewhere in the world, especially in Africa. There are many needy people in many countries and the answer is to be found, not in creating new institutions and bureaucracies, but in using most effectively those that we have already.

In closing, let me remind the House of some of the things that we are doing to help Ethiopia in its need. In the last three weeks we have sent Land Rovers and other supplies for the voluntary agencies and tomorrow we shall be flying out mobile workshops for Ethiopia's relief and rehabilitation commission to help it repair vehicles needed to transport food. We are responding quickly to other requests put to us by the commission, recognising the valiant efforts that it is making to get food to the hungry. In the same plane, tomorrow, there will be blankets, plastic sheeting and food kits for distribution by the voluntary agencies to those who are cold and hungry. Hon. Members have referred to the airlift of food and other supplies within Ethiopia by the Royal Air Force. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury said that he hoped the Royal Air Force would be able to stay in Ethiopia until all urgent needs had been met.

As the House is aware, we have agreed to supply two aircraft for three months. We think that, with the two Air Force Hercules, there are enough planes in Ethiopia at present to transport essential food and relief supplies. Keeping two aircraft fully operational in the country also involves the use of five aircraft and 100 men. I believe, from all the reports that I have heard, that our Royal Air Force team is doing a splendid job.

As I said earlier, our help is not limited to Ethiopia. The House will know that I approved recently £250,000 for relief in Chad. That will support a Red Cross feeding project. In addition, I have in the last few days earmarked up to £500,000 for drought relief in the Sudan, much of it for projects identified by British voluntary agencies. We are doing what we can and what is more, we can be sure that our contributions get through to the hungry, and for that I pay a special tribute to the many workers and others who face hardship and danger to achieve this goal.

There are many more things to be said, and many more things will be said in the House about the problem that we are discussing. I hope that nothing I have said has given any impression of complacency. I believe that what has to be done is urgent and extremely important.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: We are all grateful for what the Minister has said and for the fact that he is going out to Ethiopia to see conditions for himself. Will he give us an assurance that as soon as he comes back he will make a statement in the House, assuming that the Leader of the House makes it possible?

Mr. Raison: I shall consider that carefully. As the hon. Gentleman says, it is up to the Leader of the House to determine whether I can make a statement, but I note his point.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): Will my right hon. Friend comment on the reports in the press that much of the effort of some of the multilateral agencies has been wasted because of in-fighting and that there must be a more co-ordinated and friendly effort between them in future if aid is to get through more quickly than at present?

Mr. Raison: I do not think that the in-fighting has been in Ethiopia. It may happen in other places from time to time, and that can be worrying, but my impression is that, given the sudden, enormous surge of activity, the system out there is not working too badly, and I believe that with the addition of a special co-ordinator, and with strengthening in one or two other ways, it will work increasingly well.

We are trying desperately to do the right things. We shall have to keep it up. The problem will not be solved in a week or two We all know that. However, progress is being made in meeting a challenge that is obviously of enormous importance.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL FINANCE

Children's Shoes

1. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimated increase in revenue would accrue from levying 15 per cent. value added tax on children's shoes.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): It is estimated that the net additional full year revenue at 1984-85 prices would be about £50 million.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Financial Secretary accept the findings of the Munro committee in 1973, which concluded that there was a causal relationship between the price of children's footwear and the incidence of foot disease? Will he accept that a short-term saving of £50 million makes no sense if it prejudices the longer-term health of the nation's feet? Therefore, will he give the House an assurance that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not considering imposing VAT on children's footwear?

Mr. Moore: The Government have no reason to doubt the continuing validity of the conclusion reached by the Munro committee. I know that the hon. Gentleman would not expect me to say more than the Minister of State, Treasury, my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Hayhoe), said on 25 October, which was that we had no set views at present on how the Government might shift the burden of taxation from taxes on earnings to taxes on spending.

Mrs. Jill Knight: Will my hon. Friend accept that there is considerable worry on both sides of the House about the possibility of VAT being levied on children's shoes? Will he recognise that the present system, which does not impose VAT on shoes that help developing feet, has certainly made a contribution to the health of children's feet?

Mr. Moore: I recognise the point made by my hon. Friend. I notice that she has put her name to early-day motion 109, which has been signed by hon. Members of all parties. I certainly take note of my hon. Friend's views.

Mr. Fatchett: Will the Financial Secretary tell us how many jobs would be lost in the boot and shoe industry as a result of the imposition of VAT?

Mr. Moore: The Government are aware of the concern expressed by United Kingdom manufacturers of boots and shoes. They have said that the imposition of VAT could lead to a diminution of employment. That is the view of the manufacturers. The Government have listened to them and are aware of that view.

Mr. Jessel: Is my hon. Friend aware that those of us who, 12 years ago, discouraged the then Chancellor of the Exchequer from taxing children's shoes have had no reason to change our minds and that we accept the argument that tight shoes for children can cause deformed feet for life? However, is my hon. Friend aware that that argument did not, and does not, apply to other clothing?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend's independence of spirit is appreciated, not only by his constituents, but by the Government. I recognise the consistency with which he has expressed his views and we always take account of the views of all hon. Members on these issues.

Mr. Blair: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that Britain is almost unique in Europe in having a proper fitting service for shoes, which greatly contributes to the health care of our children? Does he realise that the uncertainty is undermining confidence in the industry and whetting the appetite of foreign producers of less good footwear? If the Government are not prepared to support British industry in the interests of our children, when are they prepared to support it?

Mr. Moore: I hope that it is not inappropriate for me to congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his first appearance at the Dispatch Box. I hope that that will not create too much difficulty for him in his future career. However, I know that he will not expect me to accept the kind of nonsense with which he has started.

Public Debt

2. Mr. Wainwright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what extent the trend of public debt interest is higher than his forecast of March.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): "The Autumn Statement 1984" gives estimated figures for debt interest in 1984-85 and 1985-86 which are respectively about £½ billion and £1 billion above previous estimates.

Mr. Wainwright: As the Chancellor of the Exchequer has referred not only to the autumn uprating of the current debt estimate but to the estimate for 1985-86, which is stretching a long way ahead, how does he explain his recent statement that the prospect is of further interest rate cuts? Will the right hon. Gentleman say something about interest rates to reassure British industry?

Mr. Lawson: I can deal with the hon. Gentleman's puzzlement quite simply. The increase in the estimates to which I referred is an increase over what was envisaged at the the time of the last Budget. When I say that I now see a prospect of interest rates falling, I am talking about falling from their present levels. I am glad to say that that prospect remains as a result of this Government's policies.

Sir William Clark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that as the national debt increases year by year because of overspending, interest charges will obviously increase? As the interest payments on the national debt are now more than £45 million per day, would it not be folly to increase our public expenditure now?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is quite right. It would be folly to increase public expenditure now, and that is why the Government have no intention of doing so. It is a quite remarkable fact that, despite the miners' strike and the events in the United States, where interest rates have risen sharply, the level of interest rates in Britain is no higher than it was at the time of the last general election, and is set to go lower.

Privatisation

3. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the impact on the economy of the privatisation programme.

Mr. Moore: Privatisation helps the economy by giving companies the freedom and the challenge of the market place. This greatly benefits their customers, their employees, and the nation.

Mr. Howarth: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that British Aerospace is a fine example of the benefits of privatisation, with record sales and profits? Will he take forward with enthusiasm that programme of genuine public ownership?

Mr. Moore: I fully endorse what my hon. Friend said. British Aerospace is a classic example, because it is winning major orders against fierce international competition. My hon. Friend will know from the latest published accounts that the turnover of British Aerospace is up 62 per cent. A higher turnover produces higher profits and increased investment, and increases the number of jobs, which is something that I suspect all hon. Members want.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Is it not bizarre that the Labour party, which calls for increased public ownership of wealth and assets, should at the same time refuse to support denationalisation in the form, for example, of the sale of council houses or shares in British Telecom, when that is the most effective way of giving individual members of our society a genuine stake in the national wealth?

Mr. Moore: I have difficulty in understanding what is not bizarre about the Labour party's policies. My hon. Friend will realise that the employees of industries which were once nationalised but are now in the private sector have become owners as well as earners and are committed to their success, and that that suggests that the Opposition are divorced from the real views of the majority of the electorate as expressed at the last election.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Why have the Government not taken the opportunity with British Airways and British Telecom to increase competition so that the consumer, rather than just the Treasury, benefits? Did not the Government back down when they had the opportunity of bringing about greater competition in civil aviation because the interests of the Treasury were put first?

Mr. Moore: It is quite the reverse. We are delighted to have any support for privatisation from the alliance parties, recognising that privatisation will give competition. We trust that the alliance parties will look at how new regulatory structures seek to aid that competition by helping the consumer, not the politician.

Dr. McDonald: Is the Minister aware that the main privatisation sales have so far brought £1·9 billion to the Exchequer, which is £450 million less than the shares are now worth and that it represents an opportunity cost to the Government? After all, if the Government had invested that money in the infrastructure, it would have been better used to create 100,000 new jobs.

Mr. Moore: The reality is perfectly expressed by the hon. Lady, in the sense that those companies have done much better in the private sector. Freed from the dead hand of state, the turnover of Cable and Wireless is up by 122 per cent., of Amersham by 80 per cent., of British Aerospace by 62 per cent., of Britoil by 44 per cent., and of National Freight by 14 per cent. Those successes are shared by the employees as well as by the market place. Instead of sticking to their Clause Four commitments, Opposition Members should try to discuss these issues with the employees of denationalised industries.

Income Tax

5. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate at what income level a family of average size would begin to pay less tax, both direct and indirect, than they would have done in 1979.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): Families with earnings above about half the average will now be paying a smaller proportion of their earnings in income tax than in 1978-79. The amount paid in indirect taxes depends, of course, on individual spending patterns.

Mr. Lloyd: I am grateful to the Minister for not answering my question. Perhaps I can try to help him. Does he agree, not with me, but with the present Foreign Secretary, who said in 1979 that the basic rate of tax plus of course national insurance contributions had the deterrent effect of a tax on earnings? — [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] I would not want to misrepresent the Foreign Secretary. Does the Minister agree that even a family on double the average earnings, at 1983-84 prices, is paying about £110 in national insurance contributions and income tax this year although they were paying less than £90 in 1978-79? There has been a £10 increase even in indirect taxation and only the very rich have gained.

Mr. Stewart: Allowing for inflation since 1978-79, the married man on average earnings is now paying £4 a week less than under Labour in its last year in office. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary was absolutely right in 1979 to point to the excessive burden of income tax and the high basic rate.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Has not the autumn statement given some leeway for tax cuts in the spring? Will the Government consider carefully the merits of raising tax thresholds yet again, as they have for the last two years? If tax thresholds are raised, that will give a greater incentive to people to work. Does my hon. Friend agree that taxes start at far too low a level?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend's remarks will have been heard by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The tax threshold has been far too low. I am glad to say that in real terms under this Government in the last five years the threshold has been increased by 16 per cent. in real terms. That is an important achievement.

Mr. Blair: Will the Minister please confirm in plain terms that, after deducting income tax and national insurance contributions, since this Government took office people have had to earn over £18,000 a year to have less to pay and more to spend.

Mr. Stewart: The Opposition continually confuse percentages of tax paid. I thought that the Opposition believed that as earnings rose the percentage of tax paid should rise. Disposable income per head has risen by 6 per cent. under this Government. That takes into account all the tax, deductions and the cost of indirect taxes borne in prices.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I sense that the mood of the House is that we should have shorter questions and answers.

Economic Progress

6. Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is satisfied with the progress of the economy in terms of national output and employment.

7. Mr. Dormand asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied with the progress of the economy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: Output has been rising at a rate of 2½ per cent. per annum since the trough of the recession. Employment has risen by an estimated ¼ million over the year to June and is expected to continue to rise. But had real wages grown less rapidly, employment would be rising still faster and unemployment would not now be rising at all.

Mr. Straw: Is the Chancellor aware that his answer shows a staggering complacency about the state of Britain's economy? Is he aware that in 1979 our performance on inflation and unemployment was average among the major seven OECD countries? Our performance on inflation is still average, but our performance on unemployment and manufacturing output is worse than that of any of our major competitors. When does he believe that manufacturing output will return to its 1979 level, since it is 10 per cent. behind that level now?

Mr. Lawson: There is general interest throughout the House in making comparisons with other countries. Since the election, and on the latest available figures our unemployment rose, I regret, by 3·7 per cent., but unemployment rose by 5·2 per cent. in the remainder of the Community. The number of jobs in Britain rose by 1 per cent., but there was no increase in the remainder of the Community. Britain's gross domestic product rose by 2·9 per cent., compared with only 1·5 per cent. in the remainder of the Community.

Mr. Forman: Although I welcome the encouraging sustained increase in output under this Government during recent years, does my right hon. Friend accept that if we are to create sufficient new jobs to counteract the inexorable rise in unemployment we must put greater emphasis in the forthcoming Budget on finding ways to lower industrial costs, which will facilitate that process?

Mr. Lawson: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that the next Budget — as was the last Budget, with the abolition of the national insurance surcharge and the reform of corporation tax and business taxation generally — must be framed to encourage the creation of new jobs. That is of the first importance. That is why reductions in taxation, and especially direct taxation, are so important.

Mr. Dormand: When will the Chancellor stop giving credence to the myth that public borrowing in Britain is dangerously high? Britain's 3 per cent. of GDP compares with 4·5 per cent. in other industrial countries. Is it not abundantly clear that such a tight fiscal policy is the major cause of Britain having 4 million unemployed? When will the Chancellor take off his blinkers and recognise the disastrous effect of those policies on the people of Britain?

Mr. Lawson: Britain does not have 4 million unemployed, I am glad to say. The recovery that we are now seeing—[Interruption.] The facts are unpalatable to Opposition Members. The recovery began when my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary very courageously made a major reduction in the borrowing requirement in the 1981 Budget.

Mr. John Townend: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one way to increase employment is to remove restriction and rigidities in the labour market and allow market forces to work? Is it not time that we did away with such bodies as wages councils and the National Dock Labour Board?

Mr. Lawson: Obviously we shall be looking seriously at the question of wages councils.

Mr. Hattersley: Does the Chancellor recall that from time to time he has favoured such organisations as election press conferences and the Leicester young farmers with his estimates for unemployment during the next year? Will he now do the same for the House of Commons?

Mr. Lawson: I made it clear earlier this week—but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman was not paying attention — that everything that the Government are doing is designed to create maximum opportunities for new jobs. I have not made forecasts about unemployment in the past and I do not propose to do so now.

Interest Rates

9. Dr. Marek asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average level of real interest rates since May 1979; and what was the average level of real interest rates during the previous five years.

Mr. Ian Stewart: There is no precise practical definition of real interest rates.

Dr. Marek: I cannot really thank the Minister for his non-answer—he could have done better. Does he accept that, because of need or policy, the Government have had a high level of interest rates since they took office? We have often heard the Chancellor say that interest rates are set to fall.

What is the difference between Britain and Germany, which, under a Conservative Government, has an economy which is generally run much better than Britain's, and whose interest rates are only half of Britain's?

Mr. Stewart: It so happens that during the 1980s real rates of interest in the United Kingdom have tended to be below those in Germany and the United States. Precise calculations are not possible, as it is necessary to make estimates of future inflation. Under the last Labour Government the average annual rate was 15 per cent. Under the previous Consevative Administration the average decreased to 10 per cent., and it is much lower now. That is the best way in which to reduce real and nominal interest rates.

Mr. Hordern: As the level of interest rates was rather higher under the last Labour Government than it is now, is not the effect of the supplementary question of the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), on which he is to be congratulated, to draw attention to that Labour Government's appalling record on inflation and to my right hon. Friend's rather good record in this respect?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is right. I have no doubt that companies in industry and commerce would greatly prefer lower interest rates and lower inflation than higher interest rates and higher inflation under a Labour Government.

Dr. McDonald: If the Minister is unable to define real interest rates, how can he provide interesting comparisons with Germany? Is it not a fact that whatever interest rate is chosen and whatever definition of real interest rate is selected, the rate was zero or negative under the previous Labour Government and has been strongly positive under Conservative Administrations since 1979? Will the Minister accept that this has been detrimental both to house owners and manufacturing industry?

Mr. Stewart: I was asked a precise question by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek), to which I gave a precise answer. Inflation was much higher under the last Labour Government than it has been under the Conservative Government. I am sure that industry and investors prefer to have lower rates of inflation and lower interest rates. Lower real rates of interest cheat savers and deny investors a proper return on their investment. If the record which the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) is claiming for the Labour Government, whom she supported in the 1970s, suggests that it is better to have high rates of inflation and negative real rates of interest, I profoundly disagree with her.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

10. Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the public sector borrowing requirement for 1984-85.

Mr. Lawson: Approximately £8½ billion.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: As we now have the lowest percentage public sector borrowing requirement in Europe and the highest level of unemployment, will the Government direct any adjustments that are made in the tax system towards reducing the cost of labour and increasing the level of employment by, for instance, reducing car tax? Will the Government consider much more sympathetically the CBI's proposals for investment in infrastructure, which would have a much more direct impact upon levels of employment?

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman has asked a curious string of questions. He is wrong about the level of employment. Unemployment, although too high in the United Kingdom, is even higher in a number of other European countries. Secondly, the effect on unemployment of investment in the infrastructure would be slight even in the short term. Infrastructure projects have to be decided on their merits—for example, whether they will earn a proper rate of return. If they will produce that return, they should go ahead. As I have said, I shall frame my next Budget firmly with a view to what, in my judgment, will offer the best prospects of lower inflation and rising employment.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my right hon. Friend accept that we all agree that the PSBR is important, as is keeping down Government borrowing? Does he agree that there would be a danger in directing indirect taxation to energy costs, so raising energy costs to industry and stultifying the recovery that is now taking place in industry?

Mr. Lawson: I know that my hon. Friend will be pleased to be reassured that there is no question of any form of tax on energy.

Mr. John Morris: How does the Chancellor's recent statement that this has been another good year affect the more than 5,000 unemployed in my constituency, particularly those who have been unemployed for a long time?

Mr. Lawson: I share the right hon. and learned Gentleman's concern for those who are out of work. The plain facts are that the vast majority of the people in work are enjoying record living standards, that output is at all-time record levels and that fixed investment is running at an all-time high. I wish that Opposition Members would give a balanced picture of the economy. The Government are ready to acknowledge the acute problems of high unemployment, and we make no secret of that. The Opposition, however, show no readiness to acknowledge that anything could conceivably be going right in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maples: Has the projected over-run in this year's PSBR had any effect on interest rates?

Mr. Lawson: It is fairly clear that interest rates are higher than they would otherwise have been. As my hon. Friend will be aware, interest rates went up particularly sharply in July. We have been able to regain most of the lost ground, but interest rates are still higher than they should be. I hope that, before long, they will come down further.

Mr. Terry Davis: If the Chancellor can increase this year's PSBR by £1·5 billion to fight the miners, why does he refuse to increase next year's PSBR by the same amount to provide jobs for the unemployed?

Mr. Lawson: I think that most people reckon that the cost of keping the power stations going, despite the miners' strike, is well worth incuring. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman will have to wait until my next Budget to discover what will be done to next year's PSBR. The Government's policy of progressively reducing the PSBR as a percentage of GDP is one which we shall continue and one by which we have secured a continuing fall in inflation and a continuing recovery.

Imports

11. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the likly effect on imports of any reductions in personal taxation.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Rees): The effects will depend on assumptions about other developments in the economy. But lower personal taxation should help to create a more vigorous and competitive economy, better able to supply the goods and services which consumers demand.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Is it not a fact that cuts in personal taxation, which inevitably extend all the way up the range, are likely to give increased purchasing power to people who are likely to buy expensive foreign imports such as Japanese goods?

Mr. Rees: My hon. Friend must take account of the fact that any tax cuts which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor may feel able to introduce are firmly within the medium-term financial strategy, and therefore will not be inflationary in their impact. My hon. Friend will take account of the fact—I know that he is interested in these matters—that exports to Europe have not suffered, but have increased since 1979 by about 79 per cent.

Mr. Wigley: Surely the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) is right in believing that, if there is an increase in disposable income at the higher income levels, there is a real danger of that income being spent on overseas holidays and that sort of thing, thereby losing potential jobs in the economy. At the same time, a cut in public expenditure to facilitate that taxation reduction loses jobs in the economy. Surely that does not solve the unemployment problem.

Mr. Rees: The hon. Gentleman overlooks the fact that, for example, total fixed investment last year was at its highest level. This year, investment in manufacturing is likely to increase by 12 per cent. and investment in service industries is likely to increase by 8 per cent. Further increases are likely next year. That is the best possible augury of employment increases.

Mr. Dickens: Is it not a fact that this nation is too highly taxed? Is it not also a fact that, if we leave more money in people's pockets, they purchase more products, which leads to more jobs?

Mr. Rees: My hon. Friend is right. According to the evidence, there is not a shortage of demand. The kind of tax cuts introduced have increased demand, with exactly the consequences outlined by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Wareing: Because the tax reductions will aid mainly the richer section of the community, are not their effects likely to be an increase in unemployment, deprivation for more people in the community, and no change to imports?

Mr. Rees: The hon. Gentleman is inaccurate. Far more money has been devoted to raising thresholds than has ever been devoted to reducing higher rates.

Taxation

12. Mr. Leigh asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level and distribution of taxation.

Mr. Moore: The current burden of taxation is still too high. It is my right hon. Friend's intention to reduce it.

Mr. Leigh: Will not the estimated £1·5 billion of tax cuts portended by the autumn statement be a much more effective way of creating jobs than the estimated extra £4 billion which would have had to be taken from the job-creating private tax-paying sector if the rates of tax inherited from the Labour Government had remained unchanged.

Mr. Moore: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Minister accept that the Tory party philosophy from 1979 onwards has been to try to encourage the entrepreneur, through lower taxes at the higher levels, to provide jobs? Does he accept that this has failed, and that it has failed no more dismally than in the City where Johnson Matthey, the gold bullion dealers, were unable to sustain their reserves and have been bailed out by the Government to the tune of £75 million? Does that not prove that the whole of the Tory party philosophy —to support the entrepreneurs, and market forces—has failed miserably?

Mr. Moore: No, Sir. That is inaccurate. The Government were not involved in the sense that the Bank of England was involved. To the extent that the Government's tax policies have sought to reduce the burden on employers, which I gather was wanted by both sides of the House, the Government first had to reduce the £4 billion-plus increase in employer taxation which occurred between 1974 and 1979 through NIC and NIS, which has now already been reduced by £3 billion and which I should have thought was an added incentive to job creation.

Community Budget

13. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied with the progress made in reforming the structure of the Common Market budget; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Fontainebleau agreement represented a significant achievement and good progress has been made on the detailed provisions for implementation.

Mr. Taylor: Why does my hon. Friend think it necessary to increase the Common Market's public spending by over £3 billion a year in real terms? Does he appreciate that it makes it rather more difficult for Back Benchers to explain to their constituents why it is necessary to have real cuts in the provision for housing, student grants and foreign aid if we are to pour more money into the Common Market, which is spending over £100 million every week on dumping, storing or destroying surplus food?

Mr. Stewart: I do not expect our contribution to the European Community over the next few years, on average, to be greater than it has been in the recent past. The important factor for the United Kingdom in any agreement to increase the amount of resources available to the Community is that we shall have in place a system of abatement which keeps our contribution below 1 per cent. of VAT own resources, while the level of contribution of all other member states will be above that figure.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend agree that if we cannot obtain a satisfactory budgetary mechanism to control expenditure we shall be unable to agree to an increase in Community resources?

Mr. Stewart: The Economic and Finance Ministers in council on Monday of this week agreed a common position on budgetary discipline which meets the British Government's objectives.

Investment

14. Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied with the current level of manufacturing investment.

16. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is satisfied with the level of investment in the economy.

Mr. Lawson: Yes. Total fixed investment this year is expected to be an all-time record. In the first half of 1984 manufacturing investment was up 15 per cent. on a year earlier.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my right hon. Friend agree that that should lead to extra and more secure jobs in manufacturing industry?

Mr. Lawson: Yes, Sir. It is of vital importance that we have profitable investment for the future development of the economy. That is why I am particularly glad that all the indications are that there will be a further good year for fixed industrial investment in 1985.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: I accept my right hon. Friend's encouraging figures, but is he not aware that there is widespread concern in the construction industry that the level of investment is not affecting it in the same way as the rest of the economy?

Mr. Lawson: I am aware of the concern in the construction industry. I am also aware that what the construction industry wants to see above all is lower interest rates because, of all industries, it is perhaps the most interest-rate sensitive. That is why the Government's policy of creating the conditions in which interest rates can come down still further is of such importance. The recent rise in the mortgage rate—[HON. MEMBERS: "Fall."]—is an indicator most welcome to the whole House, and not least to the construction industry.

Dr. Bray: Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer aware that manufacturing investment in the first half of 1984 was still 29 per cent. below the 1979 level?

Mr. Lawson: I am aware that the hon. Gentleman, unlike his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), gets his statistics right. That is absolutely correct, but the fact of the matter is that total fixed investment in the economy this year is at an all-time high.

Mr. Evans: Will the Chancellor confirm that, notwithstanding the level of investment in manufacturing industry, the Treasury confidently expects employment in the manufacturing sector to fall? Will the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge that, while we have 3,250,000 benefit claimants, there are over 4 million unemployed, many of whom used to work in manufacturing industry?

Mr. Lawson: On the contrary, manufacturing investment is on a clearly rising trend. The latest figures for manufacturing employment show that it, too, now appears to have stabilised. The House will be aware that employment in manufacturing has been rising steadily since the middle 1960s.

Interest Rates

15. Mr. Hirst asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the current level of interest rates.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Interest rates remain on a downward trend.

Mr. Hirst: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. While welcoming the recent fall in interest rates, may I ask him whether he agrees that interest rates in Britain and elsewhere in the world would be lower were it not for the colossal budget deficit in the United States? Does my hon. Friend further agree that the rapid reversal of interest rates since July's increase confirms that the Government were right to stick to their strategy?

Mr. Stewart: I agree with my hon. Friend that a reduction in the budget deficit in the United States would be welcome, particularly because it would help to ease the burden on interest rates around the world, especially in Third world countries. A 1 per cent. cut in interest rates would lead to a reduction of nearly $2 billion in interest payments for non-oil developing countries. I welcome the reduction since July, which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor predicted, contrary to the Leader of the Opposition's views at the time, which were that the rate rise was a disaster of immense proportions. If that three-month move in interest rates was a disaster of immense proportions, the right hon. Gentleman cannot have very much to complain about.

Job Creation

17. Mr. Eggar asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the economic recovery is creating new jobs.

Mr. Lawson: The number of people in work is estimated to have risen by about ¼ million in the year to June 1984 and I expect it to continue rising in 1985.

Mr. Eggar: Given the expected growth rate and the increase in the number of people of working age, does my right hon. Friend think it likely that unemployment will fall in the course of this Parliament, and what additional measures does he intend to take to ensure that it does?

Mr. Lawson: As I have said many times, the Government's economic policy is designed to create conditions which will allow more new jobs to emerge. Governments do not directly create jobs. Business and industry create jobs. Our task is to create a climate in which they can create the new jobs that are needed, and that is what we are doing.

Mr. Douglas: Few of us would grudge the Chancellor any crumb of comfort in relation to the economy, but as he takes that credit against a background of established regional policy, especially in relation to regional development grants, why do the Government wish to interfere with a policy that is bringing even a microscopic amount of success?

Mr. Lawson: The new regional development grant policy to be announced later this month will, among other things, be more job-related than the existing system.

Mr. Yeo: Does my right hon. Friend agree that to the extent that the miners' strike has retarded economic recovery this year, Arthur Scargill has been destroying other workers' jobs?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is quite right. Mr. Scargill has destroyed jobs in a number of industries, both directly and indirectly, by causing interest rates to be higher than they otherwise would be. He is also threatening the whole future of the coal industry, so the sooner the strike is over, the better.

Mr. Hattersley: The Chancellor has refused to respond to invitations from both sides to estimate unemployment levels during this Parliament. Will he now deny the generally held view that, with present policies, there will be no significant fall in unemployment during this Parliament?

Mr. Lawson: I do not intend to make any assertion about unemployment in the lifetime of this Parliament. I recall that when the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was a Minister he, too, studiously refrained from making forecasts about unemployment in the lifetime of a Parliament.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 November.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Marlow: Does my right hon. Friend share the pride of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) in the breed of men who man our pits? As it now appears that the House, the nation and a growing number of miners have had enough of the dispute in the coalfields, will my right hon. Friend do all that she can to heal the wounds caused by eight months of bitterness, violence and Scargillism?

The Prime Minister: I welcome the condemnations of violence in the past few days, but I regret that they are not universal. When the strike ends—and I hope that it will end soon—we shall have to do as much as we possibly can to build on moderate, responsible, reasonable and constructive trade unionism.

Mr. James Callaghan: Is the Prime Minister aware that she will be meeting the wishes of both sides of the House if she asks the Cabinet to reconsider the entire Foreign Office Vote—for overseas aid, representation, the overseas news service and the British Council, all of which are so important for our influence overseas—and comes back to the House with a new statement and fresh proposals?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman will be the first to recognise, when one has considered and finalised all the PESC figures it is highly unlikely that any one of them can be reopened. Indeed, I must really say that they cannot be reopened. Having seen the autumn statement, however, the right hon. Gentleman will be aware that only two Departments have precisely the figure for the coming year which they knew they would have from the last White Paper. One is the Foreign Office. The other is the Ministry of Defence. If the right hon. Gentleman will contain his impatience a little longer, it is possible that there may be a debate on this next week, when the matter can be discussed more fully.

Coal Industry Dispute

Q2. Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister what steps she proposes taking to help alleviate the social and economic consequences of the coal mining strike.

The Prime Minister: The Government have already provided the financial support so that the National Coal Board is able to offer the miners a good wage increase, a guarantee that any miner who wishes to continue in the industry will be able to do so, an investment programme that will enable the industry to improve its productivity and increase its markets, and the creation of a new enterprise company to bring new businesses to mining communities.

Two of the three unions in the coal industry as well as one third of the members of the National Union of Mineworkers have already accepted the National Coal Board's offer. Since the beginning of last week more than 6,500 miners have returned to work. I hope that those remaining on strike will follow their example.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Prime Minister aware that the great solidarity shown in Wales with the coal miners arises from people's fears that communities will be wiped off the face of the map if mines close in those communities? Is she further aware that their experience so far of the Government's efforts to bring jobs to valley communities in south Wales gives people no great confidence? Trying to starve miners back to work will not solve the basic problems that caused the strike, but will only add to the bitterness. When will the Government cease the abdication of their responsibilities and start to bring harmony instead of discord?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is well aware that uneconomic pits have had to close for a very long time. That was right, as it is the duty of the National Coal Board to run the industry efficiently and to develop it efficiently. It was always understood that closures of uneconomic pits were covered in the colliery review procedure.

There are some miners at work in pits in Wales, as the hon. Gentleman knows, and I hope that the numbers will increase, because I believe that many, many people within the industry, as well as my hon. Friends, want the situation to get back to normal as soon as possible. They want to earn good money and see the necessary decisions made. We must then work very hard on the enterprise company to try to bring new work to the mining communities.

Mr. Bellingham: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the GLC proposals for banning heavy lorries have far-reaching and damaging effects on small businesses——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) has failed to notice that this is a specific question about the coal mining industry.

Mr. Kinnock: In view of her record, the Prime Minister's answer to her hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) will be regarded both inside and outside the House as complete humbug. If the right hon. Lady genuinely wants to see a speedy end to the dispute and subsequent harmony in the coalfields and elsewhere, will she intervene now to ensure that the cut-back in production of 4 million tonnes is withdrawn, as reality has made it redundant, and also to ensure that the colliery review procedure is fully restored in line with "Plan for Coal"?

The Prime Minister: I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman any lessons on humbug. What he has said from that Dispatch Box shows that he is a self-appointed expert on the subject. At the beginning of the strike he spoke about a ballot, but we then heard virtually nothing about that until a few days ago. It took a highly distinguished trade unionist to condemn violence at a mass meeting of the National Union of Mineworkers before the right hon. Gentleman echoed the sentiments from a safe distance. He did not have the guts to go and do it himself. The right hon. Gentleman knows that the National Coal Board has always honoured the colliery review procedure. I do not know why he continually asks that question. He is well aware that the settlement reached between the NCB and NACODS was an excellent one. It is on the table, and I hope that it will be picked up by those miners who are still on strike.

Mr. Kinnock: Once again in this dispute the right hon. Lady is dodging into incidentals. On the question of meetings, will she meet the leadership of the NUM to explain—[HON. MEMBERS: "The right hon. Gentleman will not."]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a question of great importance to the House and, I think, to the country too.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the right hon. Lady meet the leadership of the miners' trade union to explain how, after eight months, during which she has allowed the cost of the dispute to increase to £3,000 million, she can sustain the idea that the hit list should stay and that no other changes should be made? How can she still tell the country that she wants a peaceful end to the dispute?

The Prime Minister: I urge the right hon. Gentleman to examine the NACODS' settlement, where he will find the answer. He knows full well that all the five named pits will go through the colliery review procedure, as enhanced by the NACODS' settlement. It is for the National Coal Board and those who are on strike to come to a settlement, as the board did with NACODS. Will the right hon. Gentleman urge the miners to return to work?

Sir Anthony Grant: Despite the excellent financial arrangements that are properly being made for the miners by the NCB, does my right hon. Friend recognise the enormous courage that is required to return to work in the face of appalling intimidation—something that is alien to this country? Will she especially say a word of praise for the fact that the lead in returning to work has been given by Derbyshire and Bolsover?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Sir. Of course, Nottinghamshire has had people back at work for some time. The return to work in Derbyshire and Bolsover has been excellent. I join my hon. Friend in admiring the bravery of those who have crossed violent picket lines to return to work. Many miners would have returned to work but for the fact that, in many places, the strike is being maintained by violence. I hope that they, too, will accept the invitation to return to work.

Dr. Owen: Are not the squeaks of the Leader of the Labour party and other Labour leaders in recent days, as they seek to distance themselves from Arthur Scargill, reminiscent of the squeaks of rats leaving the sinking ship? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Such a response only takes time from other hon. Members.

Dr. Owen: Far from taking lessons from the Artful Dodger, will the Prime Minister make it clear that there will be no question of reopening negotiations on the NACODS' settlement?

The Prime Minister: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the National Coal Board can move no further.

Mr. Concannon: My views on violence and intimidation have been on the record for a long time. In her Guildhall speech earlier this week the Prime Minister implied that the miners who had been working during the strike, and those who had returned to work, agreed with her, her Government's policies or with Mr. MacGregor. I assure her that they do not. The argument in Nottinghamshire—it is the only area for which I can speak—is a constitutional one; not one that implies recognition of her policies or those of the NCB.

The Prime Minister: I made no such assertion. Many of the miners who returned to work did so because they believe, rightly, that they are standing up for democracy. Secondly, they are showing loyalty to the industry and ensuring that the industry's customers obtain security of supply. Thirdly, they are doing what most of us wish to do—earning an honest living to keep their families.

Engagements

Q3. Mr. Marland asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Q4. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hamilton: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the movement back to work in the car factories and the mines shows how dangerously out of touch extreme Left-wing trade union members are with their members? Does she further agree that, far from tightening the noose around the nation's neck, as the extreme Left wingers intend, they are tightening it around their own necks, as Mr. Norman Willis discovered to his discomfiture?

The Prime Minister: I was delighted that there was such a forthright condemnation of violence by the General-Secretary of the TUC. I agree that if industries go on strike they will lose customers and jobs. That is the weakness of the Opposition's case, when they talk about unemployment, but support every strike that destroys existing jobs.

Mr. Tony Banks: Is the Prime Minister now aware that she misled the House on Tuesday and that the pay-outs from the Secretary of State for Transport for those whom he sacked from the London Transport board were the responsibility of the Secretary of State, and not of the GLC? Is she further aware that the proposed 6,000 redundancies on London Regional Transport will cost the taxpayers £36 million? How will that assist travellers in London?

The Prime Minister: The size of the compensation is related to the length of the remaining term of office. The GLC appointed these members for five years, when it already knew that its control of London Transport would shortly be coming to an end. That was thoroughly irresponsible, but compensation is related to that period, and had the size of the compensation been anything less my right hon. Friend could have been taken to court to give proper compensation.

Business of the House

3.32 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House whether he will state the business of the House for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 19 NOVEMBER—Second reading of the Films Bill. Motions on the Gas Catalytic Heaters Regulations and on the Legal Aid and Advice Orders for England and Wales, and for Scotland.

TUESDAY 20 NOVEMBER—Second Reading of the New Towns and Urban Development Corporation Bill. Remaining stages of the Elections (Northern Ireland) Bill.

WEDNESDAY 21 NOVEMBER—Second Reading of the Civil Aviation Bill. Motions on the Social Security Orders on contributions, re-rating and Treasury supplement.

THURSDAY 22 NOVEMBER — Opposition day (2nd Allotted Day). There will be a debate on public expenditure on overseas aid, on a motion in the name of the leader of the Liberal party. Remaining stages of the Friendly Societies Bill.

FRIDAY 23 NOVEMBER—A debate on the report of the Warnock committee on human fertilisation and embryology, Cmnd. 9314, on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

MONDAY 26 NOVEMBER—Second Reading of the Social Security Bill.

Mr. Kinnock: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his statement. I remind him of his reply to me last week, in which he assured me and the House that the debates on Monday and Tuesday of this week on the Queen's Speech would not supersede the usual full day's debate on the Chancellor's autumn statement. Can he confirm not only that we shall have that debate, but that we shall have it before the end of the month, as I asked last week? Will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that we shall have, in Government time — this is a Government responsibility—a debate on "The Rate Limitation Report 1984", a copy of which was laid before the House as long ago as last July?

Mr. Biffen: I am happy to confirm the intention to have a debate upon the autumn statement. I note the right hon. Gentleman's preferred timing and I am sympathetic to his request, but perhaps we should consider this further through the usual channels.

I note also the right hon. Gentleman's concern that there should be a debate on the rate limitation report. This can be seen in the context of the rate support grant, but we can talk about timing through the usual channels.

Mr. Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): Can my right hon. Friend explain the indecent haste for the Civil Aviation Bill? It was printed on Friday, and apparently it is to have its Second Reading next Wednesday. Can he explain to some of us who are rather suspicious about the motives of the Bill why it is being pushed through in this rushed way? Many of us feel that it will be a boost for Stansted and against the provincial airports. If it is true that the report on Stansted is to be announced on Thursday, why are we having the Second Reading debate on the Bill on Wednesday?

Mr. Biffen: I am anxious to assure my hon. Friend that the Civil Aviation Bill stands in its own right and is quite unconnected with the wider issue of Stansted, which will be the subject of an inspector's report and a Government comment on that which in due course will be considered by the House. I hope that when the time comes for Wednesday's Second Reading debate my hon. Friend will have a chance to take part and have his fears assuaged.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): On next Thursday's business, will the Leader of the House ensure that the Foreign Secretary gives a precise and unambiguous statement of the implications of the announcement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for overseas aid and other related aspects of the Foreign Office budget? Will any statement be informed by some further Cabinet discussion before then?

Mr. Biffen: All Foreign Office statements are precise and unambiguous, and I have no doubt that next Thursday will provide no exception to that rule. To reassure the hon. Gentleman, I shall make certain that his remarks are referred to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is widespread concern in all parts of the House about the decision to discuss the Warnock report on a Friday, when most right hon. and hon. Members are performing their duties in their constituencies? Will he consider rearranging the date for this debate, which is a very important one for all right hon. and hon. Members?

Mr. Biffen: It will be a sad day for Parliament when Fridays are so devalued that this kind of topic cannot be debated on a Friday. If it is of the importance that my hon. Friend suggests—and I believe that it is—right hon. and hon. Members will make it their duty to be here.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Will the Leader of the House take note that in respect of Tuesday's proposed business there are a great many detailed and difficult matters to be considered during the Committee stage of the Bill and that it will also be necessary to have a Third Reading debate, even if the Government have not seen fit to make amendments to the Bill in Committee?

Mr. Biffen: I shall bear in mind those ominous words. If we cannot make the necessary progress, we shall have to consider additional time.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): In my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Mr. Montgomery), he said that there was no connection between the Stansted report and the Civil Aviation Bill. Will he explain, therefore, why he is proceeding with such indecent haste? In July, the Civil Aviation Authority produced a 68-page report on civil aviation. The Government responded to that on 5 October with their White Paper. There has been no debate on the White Paper. Within three days of the opening of Parliament, the Civil Aviation Bill had its First Reading, and seven days later it is to have its Second Reading. What is my right hon. Friend up to?

Mr. Biffen: To the rather tedious business of announcing next week's business, which is of an unexceptional character, and of having a Bill presented which has observed all the normal courtesies related to its timing, and to try to persuade my hon. Friend that there is nothing sinister about it. It provides an opportunity for a reasonable and constructive debate on Wednesday, which I hope will be the case.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Will the Leader of the House reconsider his reply to the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie)? It is not a matter of debasing debates on Fridays. The difficulty is that many of us have already taken on commitments for that day. If such an important debate was of concern to the Government, it would not be arranged for a Friday. Will the right hon. Gentleman think again?

Mr. Biffen: We all know from personal experience that politics is a balancing of priorities. It is an important occasion, of course, and it is on a Friday. If it is that important to right hon. and hon. Members, I believe that they can be here for it.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is unlikely to be a subject of greater importance to future generations that will be debated in the House than the Warnock report? We are grateful to him for the speed with which he has arranged a debate, and there is a strong case for an early debate, but, if many hon. Members make sacrifices and stay here on Friday, will my right hon. Friend ensure that time will be given to us to speak on that day?

Mr. Biffen: I certainly note my hon. Friend's request, which is rather different from the previous request on this matter, and I shall leave it there.

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): Has the attention of the Leader of the House been drawn to early-day motion 94, which has been signed by no fewer than 118 right hon. and hon. Members, about the Dreadnought Seamen's hospital in my constituency?

[That this House calls upon Her Majesty's Government not to renege on the undertaking given on 10th June 1981 by the then Minister of Health that the future of the Dreadnought Seamen's Hospital in Greenwich is secure; notes the fact that the Report by Price Waterhouse this year concluded that no evidence had been produced to suggest that there would be any financial savings if the facility for seamen were to be moved to St. Thomas's Hospital; accepts that many redundancies would result from the suggested move and the traditions and special skills of the hospital staff would be lost; and accordingly calls on the Secretary of State to terminate procedures to close the hospital.]

In case he believes that that is merely a little local difficulty, may I point out that it is both a national and an international institution? In view of that, does he believe that time should be made available to debate this important matter in the House?

Mr. Biffen: I immediately acknowledge the importance that the hon. Gentleman adjudicates to the early-day motion and I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services to the point that he makes.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that when the Stansted report is published it will be debated in the House and that a decision whether to proceed on its recommendations will be taken by a vote?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend raises much wider issues than next week's business. I am sensitive to the representations being made on that topic and perhaps on this occasion I shall leave it at that.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): In view of the plight of the research councils, and the moratorium on the Government's information technology programme and its bearing on Britain's industrial future, will the right hon. Gentleman find an early opportunity for a debate on scientific research in Britain?

Mr. Biffen: I am sorry that I cannot offer that prospect, but I realise the importance of the topic and I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman's point is referred to those of my right hon. and hon. Friends to whom it is relevant.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): Would it not be a good idea to advance the debate on the Warnock report to Wednesday in order to kill two birds with one stone? Is my right hon. Friend aware that it is somewhat naive for him to say that the Civil Aviation Bill debate is unrelated to the Stansted matter? With the best will in the world, our suspicions are bound to be aroused. Why cannot he postpone the Civil Aviation Bill?

Mr. Biffen: The timing of the debate on Wednesday is appropriate. If I were to change it with Friday's debate on the Warnock report, I certainly would be in the hottest of hot water. I cannot now argue the merits of the legislation. That is what Wednesday's debate will be about. However, I assure my hon. Friend that the legislation stands apart from the substantive decisions that will be taken on Stansted.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): In view of the uncertainty that is felt in Wales, and probably elsewhere, about industrial investment by those contemplating investing in industry, will the Leader of the House give time for a statement next week to clarify the Government's intentions on regional policy?

Mr. Biffen: I have announced next week's business and it does not cover the topic referred to by the hon. Gentleman, but I am conscious of the significance, particularly in his part of Wales, of this issue. I shall certainly draw the attention of my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Department of Trade and Industry to the point that he makes.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Does my right hon. Friend realise that most of us expect that the Foreign Secretary will be able to give an unequivocal assurance next week that there will be no candle-end economies to mar our record on overseas aid or to interfere with the activities of either the British Council or the overseas service of the BBC? Will he accept that many of us believe that some of the money that seems to have been put aside for Stansted could be more profitably used in that way?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has kindly given me a trailer of the speech that he would make on Thursday should he be fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker. Just in case he is not, I shall make sure that his remarks are drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Leader of the House accept that we are somewhat surprised at his naive belief that Foreign Office statements are accurate? Will he persuade a Foreign Office spokesman to come to the House and tell us exactly what the Government's attitude is towards the United Nations convention on the law of the sea? We seem to be lagging behind other nations and following on the trail of the United States. Time is short for us to get in line with other nations on that issue.

Mr. Biffen: I shall convey the hon. Gentleman's request to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there was a strong feeling throughout the House and the country this week about the announcement that the green pound was to be abolished? Many people felt that there was a psychological devaluation of our currency and that the elderly would be placed at a disadvantage with the new coins. Will my right hon. Friend please do the House the courtesy of giving some time for a debate on the matter, because we are talking about our pound note, which is very important to the nation?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate that this topic excites a good deal of popular interest, but I suggest that it is an ideal subject for an Adjournment debate. I wish my hon. Friend well in the pursuit of that.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Will there be an opportunity soon for a debate on the urgent need for reform of the way in which suspected shoplifters are arrested and charged, having regard to today's remarkable victory of Mrs. Maureen Steinberg, who was awarded £1,500 in the High Court for the way in which she was treated by an Oxford street store? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is particularly important at this time of the year that traders and honest shoppers should be warned about the risks?

Mr. Biffen: I genuinely admire the skill with which the hon. and learned Gentleman develops his case and the way that he evangelises, but I do not believe that I can reasonably hold out the prospect of a debate in Government time. However, I am certain that the hon. and learned Gentleman will enjoy himself just as much on an Adjournment debate.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): In spite of the remarks of some bishops and higher clergy at yesterday's meeting of the General Synod of the Church of England, will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government still remain opposed to the disestablishment of the Church of England and that the matter will not be discussed next week?

Mr. Biffen: Well, if they are opposed, they are not letting us know next week.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Will the Leader of the House make room in next week's business for the Secretary of State for Defence to tell about his intentions as regards the NATO meeting in Brussels on 3 December on follow-on force attack, a subject about which there has been considerable dissembling by the Government, but on which I have not had satisfactory answers to a series of questions? The defence correspondents tell us that it is the first substantial change in NATO policy for 20 years. Surely we should have a proper, full and frank discussion of the subject on the Floor of the House and in the Select Committee on Defence.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Lady has already made an eloquent contribution to the subject in an Adjournment debate. I cannot promise any helpful answer in respect of the business published for next week, but I will draw her arguments to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): Bearing in mind that my right hon. Friend has ably represented a beautiful but distant part of the United Kingdom in north Shropshire for more than 23 years, will he accept from colleagues who represent constituencies that are a good way from the House that having a debate on a subject as important as the Warnock report on a Friday is unacceptable and offensive to those who need Fridays to remain in contact with their constituencies, despite what London-based Members may say?

Mr. Biffen: The records will show that I have managed to eke out a political existence with Shropshire as a parliamentary base and attendance at the House on Fridays without obvious detriment to my existence. The House would have to consider seriously any circumstance that blocked off Fridays for merely less important or trivial business. It is simply not an option that is available to us if we want to make the most of the opportunities that this House provides.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): When will the Chancellor of the Exchequer be making a statement about the bailing out of the Johnson Matthey bank? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Chancellor initially said in letters sent to me that the amount of money required by the Bank of England would be very small? However, it has now emerged that the Bank of England—the taxpayers' bank—is committed to up to £75 million. Is not it ironic that this Government, who talk about letting lame ducks go to the wall and who have allowed manufacturing industry throughout the country to be smashed, should be prepared to bail out people as soon as they see their friends in trouble or their casino economy running into flak without even making a statement from the Dispatch Box? Is it not time that they were allowed to be questioned in the House?

Mr. Biffen: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has not found today's Treasury questions sufficiently to his liking, but his difficulties have been——

Mr. Skinner: The Chancellor did not reply.

Mr. Biffen: That is a hazard in this world. However convincing ministerial replies may be, they never altogether answer the incorrigible sceptics. However, I shall certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the hon. Gentleman's discontent, just in case he has overlooked it.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware that if the Civil Aviation Bill does anything to control air traffic movements at Heathrow it will be greatly welcomed by my constituents, along with the fact that it is being debated next Wednesday?

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I do not want to be drawn into the controversy, because I have rather more than enough problems anyway. However, I am sure that it is helpful to have the debate earlier rather than later.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Should not there be an early and urgent debate on the very dangerous situation in central America, where American forces are clearly prepared to invade Nicaragua, to violate that country's independence and to destroy the social progress made? As the British Government have been the most slavish followers of Reaganite policies in central America, should not they be forced to debate in public why they consider it reasonable for the Americans to continue military aggression against the people of Nicaragua?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman deploys his case with fervour, but I am not sure to what extent it is reflected by Opposition Members. I realise that my answer is disappointing, but no provision has been made next week for such a debate, and I cannot see that a debate is likely to take place thereafter. However, it is certainly an appropriate subject for an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Is my right hon. Friend aware that Wednesday is not a day too soon for the Second Reading of the Civil Aviation Bill and that many of us would have preferred the Second Reading to be on Monday so that we could bring nearer the day when the Government implement their clear and definite promise to limit the number of flights through Heathrow? As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) has said, that implementation will be warmly welcomed by millions of people living on the west side of London.

Mr. Biffen: I wish to say nothing that will incite further the mild civil disorder that seems to have broken out behind me. I say only that I believe that next week's business is an admirably judged programme, given the wicked nature of this world.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): May I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to an early-day motion that was tabled last Session on the subject of loan sharks? Given how elusive Government Departments are about accepting responsibility for that despicable trade, in which about 600,000 per cent. has been charged to poor, mainly unemployed people living on council house estates, will he give the House the opportunity of debating the issue so that we can identify whose responsibility it is to deal with it?

Mr. Biffen: I can offer no prospect of an early debate, but I shall certainly draw the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the attention of my colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry, as I think that the matter falls within that Department's responsibilities.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Will my right hon. Friend show the respect and understanding that we know he has for the starving people of the Third world by ensuring that there will be a decent interval between Thursday's debate on foreign aid and the motion that the Government must bring forward shortly to provide an extra £200 million to cover the Common Market's wild overspending this year on creating and destroying food surpluses?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that that is the type of sentiment that always rests with me.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Remembering the fanfare of trumpets that followed the announcement at Brighton that the Conservative party had discovered a policy to deal with drug abuse and the absence of any mention of such a policy in the Queen's Speech, are we not entitled to a full statement in the House on the Government's policy?

Mr. Biffen: I shall draw that suggestion to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend share a deep concern about the threat that drug abuse represents.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Is my right hon. Friend aware that it has been rumoured for some time that the Stansted report is sitting in the Department of Transport? Is he further aware that people in the north-west regard with the greatest suspicion the debate on the Civil Aviation Bill being held on Wednesday rather than a debate on the Stansted report, which is of enormous importance to the north-west's prosperity?

Mr. Biffen: If the report is sitting in the Department of Transport, it is great news to me. I simply do not believe it.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a statement to be made next week to explain whether the Government stand by their figures in the summer months when they claimed that 60,000 miners were working in the coalfields? If the National Coal Board figures for the last few days are correct and 6,500 miners have gone back to work, why does the board now admit that only 57,000 miners are working? If we cannot have a statement, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for someone in the Government to take some maths lessons?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman has an Adjournment debate on that topic on Monday. He will receive all his answers then and retire defeated from the field.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call all those hon. Members who have been standing.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend take note that Londoners are concerned about reports that the GLC is establishing a burial fund to continue to fight for its retention after its abolition? Since large sums of ratepayers' and taxpayers' money are involved, will he arrange for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to make an early statement to the House on this important matter?

Mr. Biffen: I understand my hon. Friend's anxieties. I shall certainly draw them to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. My hon. Friend can rest reasonably assured that we shall have plenty of debating time in the weeks and months ahead.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Yesterday's debate was on further education, not higher education. Is it possible to have an early debate on the increase in parental contribution, particularly since many married women in work and with adult offspring in higher education will discover that they are paying an effective taxation rate of 64 or 74 per cent. which will allow them merely one quarter of their earnings at the top of the scale? Will my right hon. Friend also put in the Library detail of the agreement for the financial mechanism within Europe?

Mr. Biffen: I shall consider my hon. Friend's second suggestion. I cannot offer the prospect of an early debate, but I shall ensure that his remarks are transmitted to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): In view of the increasing number of prosecutions for Sunday trading, will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate on Sunday trading so that we may guage the feelings of the House?

Mr. Biffen: The ballot has just been taken for private Members' motions and it is just possible that one successful hon. Member will take up that subject in a Bill.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Does my right hon. Friend accept that terrorism throughout the western world and in this country has reached alarming proportions? Short of protection and detection, western Governments seem to be short of ideas on how to combat it. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the subject is now so serious that we should debate it?

Mr. Biffen: I acknowledge the importance of the topic and the desirability of its being debated in the House. It is a subject particularly suited to the initiative of a private Member using the Adjournment mechanism.

Questions to Ministers

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During questions to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when we reached question No. 8 the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) was not in his place. If the question had been taken, a serious attack on the Government would have resulted. Will you try to find out whether the Treasury Bench encouraged the hon. Gentleman not to be here when we reached that question? After the Dewhurst affair, I would not trust the Treasury Bench as far as I could kick it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Although the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) was not present—which is not a matter for me—we reached question No. 17, which was similar to question No. 8. Therefore, I do not think that the point of order is valid.

The question of hon. Members not being present during Question Time was raised yesterday. If hon. Members are kind enough to let me know that they cannot be present, I do not call their names.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologise to you and to the whole House for not being in the Chamber when my question was called. The annunciator showed question No. 5, but when I came to the Chamber question No. 8 had already passed. It was entirely my fault, and I apologise.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you give the House some guidance on procedure when hon. Members, for various reasons, cannot attend Question Time? Would it not be helpful to the House if in such circumstances hon. Members could entrust other hon. Members to ask their questions? What is the proper forum in which to raise that suggestion?

Mr. Speaker: I think that it would be the Procedure Committee, but if the hon. Gentleman thinks through his suggestion he will realise it would be rather bad luck for those lower on the Order Paper.

Right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask your guidance on the status of the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen)? I believe that you have suggested that he is a Back Bencher. Therefore, I wonder why he receives preferential treatment, especially during Question Time.

Mr. Speaker: I think that the answer is common knowledge and that the hon. Gentleman did not need to make the point. The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) is a Back Bencher. The Front Benches stop at the Gangway. However, the right hon. Gentleman is the leader of the Social Democratic party and also a Privy Councillor.

BILL PRESENTED

SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. Secretary Fowler, supported by Mr. Secretary Younger, Mr. Secretary Edwards, Mr. Secretary Hurd, Mr. Secretary King, Mr. Barney Hayhoe, Mr. Tony Newton and Mr. Ray Whitney, presented a Bill to amend the law relating to occupational pensions, social security and statutory sick pay; and for connected purposes; And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed [Bill 10.]

Orders of the Day

Elections (Northern Ireland) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and his right hon. and hon. Friends.

4.2 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The House has before it today a Bill designed to strengthen the existing safeguards against personation—that is, voting as some other person—at elections held in Northern Ireland. The problem of electoral abuse in Northern Ireland, and personation in particular, is not new. It has long been practised. Indeed, it has been the subject of many cheerful jokes. But there comes a time when the joking has to stop. In the Government's view, the scale of the problem has changed so dramatically in recent years as to amount to a threat to the integrity of the electoral system. That is why we ask the House to act.

The Bill is designed to underpin the fundamental principle, long established in the United Kingdom, that it is for each voter to cast his or her vote in the way he or she wishes. Successive reform Bills in the present and last centuries have culminated in the arrangements that we now have and that are generally accepted as essential in a free society. Vote stealing has always been wrong. It is not only an offence against the person whose vote is stolen, but against basic democratic principles. In a democracy, honest disagreement between citizens is resolved by honest voting.

Let me give the House some of the background. Following allegations of a significant increase in electoral abuse, notably personation, at the Northern Ireland Assembly elections in October 1982, steps available within the law as it stands were taken to diminish the scope for abuse at the parliamentary general election in June 1983. For example, particular attention was devoted to ensuring that the election rules were administered uniformly. Careful thought was given to the deployment of police and the numbers and siting of polling stations. The parties were encouraged to urge their candidates in Northern Ireland to challenge suspected personators. Challenging was a good deal more determined in June 1983 than at the Assembly election in 1982—as shown by the significant increase in arrests for personation compared with the Assembly election. It was clear that a more vigorous approach to challenging had been adopted.

It is, in practice, very difficult to prove personation under the present law. No inquiry as to the right of any person to vote, other than the statutory questions, may be asked. In the face of highly co-ordinated efforts to personate, it was not possible to prevent massive personation at last year's general election.

It might be useful to add a word about the statutory questions. Right hon. and hon. Members may know that the statutory questions are very limited. They are prescribed in rule 35 of the parliamentary elections rules in the first schedule to the Representation of the People Act as follows:

[Mr. Douglas Hurd]

> "(i) Are you the person registered in the register of parliamentary electors for this election?"

Then the entry in the register is read.

> "(ii) Have you already voted, here or elsewhere, at this by-election [general election], otherwise than as proxy for some other person?"

Those are the statutory questions. No inquiry as to the right of any person to vote, other than the above questions, may be made. The voter must not be asked, for example, to spell his name. Nor may a voter be asked if he has been bribed or whether he has done anything which, if he does vote, will render him liable to a prosecution.

The Government have concluded that a Bill is necessary, and that this Bill represents the best way forward. The United Kingdom electoral system is rightly designed to make voting as easy as possible. It was not designed to withstand a campaign of concerted electoral abuse, especially when the competing candidates and their agents do not always make full use of the present electoral law, not least because of intimidation. Various techniques, few of them original, have been used to abuse the democratic process — and in particular personation, involving voting in person or by proxy as some other person. It can range from polling on behalf of someone unable or unwilling to turn up at the polling station, to using the vote of a person who is known not to be going to vote, to outright stealing of a vote from a supporter of another party who has not yet voted. There is no doubt that at the general election in June 1983 large teams of personators were used.

Some evidence of electoral malpractice is provided by the number of tendered ballot papers issued. Those are special pink ballot papers submitted by genuine electors who discover when they get to the polling stations that their votes have already been cast. I should perhaps explain the use of tendered ballot papers under the present law. If a person representing himself to be a particular elector named on the register and not named in the absent voters' list, or a particular person named in the list of proxies and not named in the list of proxies entitled to vote by post, applies for a ballot paper after another person has voted as such an elector or proxy, the applicant shall, upon duly answering the statutory questions, be entitled to make a ballot paper in the same manner as any other voter. But such a ballot paper is pink and is called a tendered ballot paper, and instead of being put into the ballot box, it is given to the presiding officer and endorsed by him with the name of the voter and his number in the register of electors, and set aside in a separate packet. The voter's name and number on the register, or in the case of a proxy, the elector's number on the register are entered on a list called the tendered votes list. On a scrutiny by an election court the vote of the person personating will be struck off, and the vote of the person tendering added. As the admission of the tendered votes raises a prima facie case of personation, evidence may be admitted to rebut it. It follows that the number of tendered ballot papers submitted at an election is an indication—but only an indication, not a precise measure—of the extent of personation at that election. At the 1982 Assembly and 1983 parliamentary general elections the numbers of tendered ballot papers issued was 762 and 949 respectively. The largest numbers were generally in constituencies with a large nationalist electorate in which Sinn Fein made a particular effort, that is to say Belfast, West and Belfast, North, Mid-Ulster, Foyle and Newry and Armagh.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): Is it not true that the same tendered ballot papers are used by a presiding officer when a person arrives at the polling station and finds that his name is not on the electoral list? If the list is not properly compiled, that can increase the number of tendered papers.

Mr. Hurd: I do not believe so, but I shall leave my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to deal with that matter. I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman has it exactly right.

A second indication is the number of arrests for personation. There were 26 and 149 arrests at the two elections in 1982 and 1983 that I have been citing. But these figures are likely to be only the start of the matter. They give no real indication of the full extent of electoral abuse. The number of tendered ballot papers issued only indicates those votes stolen where the genuine elector has decided to attend the polling station to vote and feels sufficiently strongly to submit a pink ballot paper. Arrests —the other indicator that I have cited—are more a measure of diligence of candidates and their agents in calling for the arrest of personators, often in difficult or threatening circumstances.

The Government are in no doubt that the extent of personation was greatest at the general election last year. Some observers believe that as much as 20 per cent. of the Sinn Fein vote was acquired by malpractice. The precise figure is obviously difficult to establish given the circumstances of electoral abuse. But that the figure is significant is, I believe, widely accepted throughout the community in Northern Ireland. Personation at the European elections this year seems to have been well down on last year's general election, but I do not believe that the House should take comfort from that. That the opportunity for large-scale malpractice can be available to those bent on destroying constitutional politics in Northern Ireland is, in the Government's view, adequate justification for introducing the Bill.

In considering this, my predecessor and I have taken careful account of the views of those parties in Northern Ireland which, whatever their differences, are united in their belief in constitutional action and the need to protect and preserve the democratic process. I do not propose to list the representations made to the Government by the constitutional parties over the past two years, but we have received strong representations from all the constitutional parties to take decisive action to reduce the opportunities for personation.

I draw the House's attention to a report by the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights in Northern Ireland on electoral abuse published on 1 October this year following a thorough investigation. The report was critical of Government in some respects, but in paragraph 32, on the crucial quesion of personation, it stated:

> "There is, in the Commission's view, a widespread perception that personation has, in recent elections, become much more systematic and organised and more closely associated with paramilitary groups. The majority of political parties have expressed the view that personation at recent elections both in terms of the number of votes lost and of the manner in which personation is conducted has had more effect than previously. Unofficial estimates vary but even the lowest estimate obtained by the Commission is not insignificant. Proof is notoriously difficult to obtain and hard-and-fast evidence has not been produced to substantiate or disprove allegations but the weight of opinion within the majority of political parties, with varying degrees of enthusiasm and a wide variety of misgivings, is that some form of identification should be required before a person claiming a vote is given a ballot paper. The Commission has reservations about the merits of such a proposal but accepts that it warrants testing."

When the Government came to consider their proposals, they concluded that the effective choice lay between requiring voters to produce some kind of special identification document or requiring them to produce one of a number of specified existing documents. I know that the first option is favoured by some. Indeed, the question of identity cards raises a much wider issue which it would be hard in practice to resolve in terms of Northern Ireland alone. The issue of identity cards for the purpose of voting might be seen as the first step towards requiring people to carry and produce them for other purposes. This is a well worn argument which I remember when I was a Minister of State, Home Office not long ago. I am sure that the House would want to think very carefully before going down that path. It is fair to add that that solution would be slow to introduce, expensive and cumbersome. Some electors might refuse or otherwise fail to obtain such a document however much the parties encouraged them to do so. The effect of this might be to distort the result.

The Government have therefore concluded after a long study that the right course is to require voters to produce one of a number of specified documents. I know of the argument, of which it is certain we shall hear more in the debate, that the Bill offers no satisfactory means of establishing that a person requesting a ballot paper is in fact the person whom he claims to be. I believe that ours is the best method that can be devised once one accepts, as I think one has to at present, that identity cards are excluded. The provisions of the Bill need to be seen whole, and in particular clause 1, on prescribed documents, needs to be considered alongside the new and important offence created by clause 3. In all the circumstances, the Government have concluded that the approach set out in the Bill best balances the urgent need to reduce the opportunities for personation against minimum change in the established procedures for voting. We wanted to find something which can be quickly applied, is effective, and disrupts to the least possible extent the traditional method of voting.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Does the Secretary of State accept that it is a grave departure that a document issued by a foreign country and a foreign Government should be brought forward at an election within the United Kingdom for the purpose of identification?

Mr. Hurd: That might well be so if we were proposing in the Bill to alter the franchise. We are not doing that and the objection that the hon. Gentleman raises does not really apply.

I add one more general point. Some may argue that they do not disagree in principle with a Bill to deal with electoral abuse but believe that it should be applied to the whole of the United Kingdom. I have seen some signs that some of my colleagues who represent English constituencies hold that view. I know of the anecdotes that circulate —arrangements in other parts of the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland are not strictly matters for me— but the Government have no evidence that there is any widespread electoral abuse in Great Britain. No statistics for tendered ballot papers completed or arrests for electoral offences are kept by the Home Office because they are generally negligible in Great Britain. There is certainly in Great Britain no widespread and organised electoral abuse backed up by paramilitary force, such as Northern Ireland has had to endure.

I turn briefly to the main provisions of the Bill. Clause 1 amends the parliamentary elections rules, as respects Northern Ireland, by providing that a ballot paper will not be issued to a voter unless he has produced one of a number of documents that have been prescribed in regulations. As regards the Northern Ireland local government elections next May, the Government propose to bring forward an Order in Council, which will be subject to affirmative resolution, in good time for those elections. The order will contain provisions equivalent to those in clauses 1 to 3 and will also set out the prescribed documents. The provision that I have described is mandatory—the presiding officer or clerk will have no discretion to permit someone to vote without producing a document.

Clause 1 provides also that a presiding officer will refuse to issue a ballot paper if he decides that a document produced by a voter raises a reasonable doubt as to whether the voter is the person he represents himself to be, and further provides that only a presiding officer, not a clerk, may refuse a ballot paper because he decides that a voter's prescribed document raises a reasonable doubt about his identity.

Clause 2 provides that a decision that a prescribed document raises reasonable doubts about a voter's identity may only be reviewed on an election petition. Otherwise, it is to be final, and not to be questioned in any proceedings.

Clause 3 is of crucial importance. It creates an offence of having a prescribed document not bearing the possessor's name, or forged prescribed documents, on polling day for purposes of personation. Clause 3 gives the police the necessary powers in connection with the offence to search vehicles and premises on polling day. The new offence under clause 3(1) attracts maximum penalties on conviction on indictment of imprisonment for two years or a fine or both; and on summary conviction three months' imprisonment or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum of £2,000, or both. This clause should provide a sound deterrent to those who might be tempted to amass those prescribed documents for the purpose of personation.

Clause 4 provides that the provisions of the Representation of the People Acts on entitlement to vote do not prejudice the operations of clauses 1 and 2. The Bill does not directly bear on the franchise: no one will lose the right to be on the electoral register. As I have said, those who do not have a prescribed document will not be able to vote.

Clause 5 ensures that provisions corresponding to the main provisions of this Bill which apply to parliamentary elections may be included in subordinate legislation relating to local government elections in Northern Ireland, elections to the Northern Ireland Assembly, and elections held there to the European Parliament.

Clause 7 deals with citation, extent and commencement including—this is significant—a provision whereby, as respects local government elections in Northern Ireland, the Bill shall come into force as soon as it is passed. The Government believe it is essential for an order including these provisions to be operating in time for the local government elections in Northern Ireland next May. I know that, for such a Bill, notes on clauses are thought useful by right hon. and hon. Members. They are now available for information in the Vote Office, as I have already informed the party leaders in correspondence.

I shall now consider the documents that might be prescribed. There should be, and I am sure there will be, considerable debate about them. The Government do not have a closed mind on them. We shall listen carefully to arguments in debate both in the House and in another place. I say to those who might be concerned about the list of documents that will apply for the local government elections next May that we intend to announce, before this Bill completes its parliamentary passage, the list of documents that will be included in the draft Order in Council for Parliament's consideration early in the new year.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I thought that the right hon. Gentleman said that the final list of documents to be included in regulations would be announced before the Bill completes its passage. As we were told during the business statement this afternoon that the legislation was expected to complete its passage through the House next Tuesday—that is what we are concerned about—does that mean that the list will be available next Tuesday?

Mr. Hurd: I said:

"we intend to announce, before this Bill completes its parliamentary passage—" obviously, that can include the passage through another place—

"the list of documents that will be included in the draft Order in Council for Parliament's consideration early in the new year."

The drawing up of a satisfactory list is not easy. [Interruption.] I entirely accept that. That is why we are especially eager before the list is final, to have the views of right hon. and hon. Members representing Northern Ireland constituencies.

There are two main dangers: on the one hand, making a list so extensive that easily forged or easily obtained documents are included, and, on the other, making it so narrow that some legitimate voters find difficulty in producing any of the documents. With those considerations in mind, we think at present that the list should comprise: a current Great Britain or Northern Ireland driving licence—but not a provisional driving licence—a current United Kingdom, United Kingdom visitors, or Republic of Ireland passport; a current book for the payment of allowances, benefits or pensions issued by the Department of Health and Social Services for Northern Ireland; a medical card issued by the Northern Ireland Central Services Agency; and a marriage certificate issued by the Registrar General for England and Wales, Scotland or Northern Ireland, in the case of a woman married since the qualifying date for the register used in the election.

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): The explanatory document provided to hon. Members gave me the impression that the last category included the medical card, plus the marriage lines, of the woman married during the period. Is the right hon. Gentleman saying that it is one or the other? If so, why is it important for the woman to have to produce her marriage lines?

Mr. Hurd: There may be circumstances in which it would be desirable from her point of view, and advisable because of the purposes of the Bill, that that should be one of the documents produced.

Mr. McCusker: Why?

Mr. Hurd: There could be circumstances in which that certificate would be necessary to show that the person concerned is the person on the register.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): A change of surname.

Mr. Hurd: That is right. A change of surname may have occurred and the marriage certificate may therefore be the relevant document.

Mr. Ross: Is it not a choice of any of those documents? If the lady does not want to produce the marriage licence, she does not have to do so, unless she cannot produce one of the other documents.

Mr. Hurd: Exactly.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell rose——

Mr. McCusker rose——

Mr. Hurd: I should continue. I know that there is some criticism of the inclusion of the medical card.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The Secretary of State referred to a marriage certificate issued by the Registrar General for England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. What about a marriage certificate issued by the minister on the day of the marriage? Will that not be acceptable?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman can develop that point during the debate, and we shall listen with respectful attention to his argument. I believe that the marriage certificate issued by the Registrar General will be thought by most people to be the right document in this sense.

I know that there is some doubt about the inclusion of the medical card. The advantage of the medical card is that every member of the Northern Ireland electorate may obtain one without charge. If we confined ourselves to the other documents I have listed, there might be people who were, in effect, disfranchised because it was difficult or expensive for them to get hold of one of the prescribed documents. That, of course, is not our intention.

We recognise that personation is but one form of electoral abuse, but we believe that it is the only one that should be tackled urgently in the Bill. It makes good sense to tighten up the postal voting rules. I know that that is of great significance to some right hon. and hon. Members here. We believe that the right legislative vehicle for parliamentary elections is the Representation of the People Bill, which will be introduced shortly and, as regards next year's local government elections, the rule on postal voting can be set out in the order for those elections.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: I apologise for interrupting again. I understood the Secretary of State to say that the major Bill, so to speak, which is to come forward would be the appropriate vehicle for tightening up the conditions for postal voting. May I take it that that means that the Government have abandoned their notion of dealing with the difficulties of postal voting in Northern Ireland by withholding the right to vote by post?

Mr. Hurd: No, it does not mean that. It means that we shall put before the House in the Representation of the People Bill, proposals that are familiar to the right hon.

Gentleman, but we shall listen to what is said. If I may, I shall resume what I was proposing to say because I was going to deal with that point.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and I are fully conscious of the anxiety that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) and others have expressed about the proposed absent voting provisions in the Representation of the People Bill. As we have already made clear, we shall listen with great care to the arguments advanced during the passage of that Bill so as to produce arrangements that best meet Northern Ireland's particular circumstances.

I recognise that the introduction of such a Bill represents a departure from the traditional British way of holding elections. I regret that, and I regret the necessity for introducing the Bill, but I have no doubt of the necessity. I believe that first reactions in the Province to the Bill support the belief that our determination to reduce the opportunities for personation will attract considerable support throughout Northern Ireland and among all those in the House and in the United Kingdom who wish to uphold the democratic process.

The existing arrangements were not designed to withstand the pressures to which they are now subject, and, therefore, we have no option but to propose further measures. This, therefore, is an important Bill. We must take early action to protect the right to vote and to frustrate those bent on organising electoral abuse. The point of principle is clear. However, it is right that the points of detail should be argued. We have many differences in the House, and they are argued with strength and sometimes with bitterness, but we all accept how they are finally resolved—in the votes cast by those whom we serve.

We do not count our successes by the number of bombs in the market place or bodies in the street. Our weapon is the democratic system of voting. The Bill will help to ensure that our weapon is kept serviceable and clean. I commend it to the House.

4.32 pm

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): May I welcome the Secretary of State to his new responsibilities? This is the first occasion on which he has taken part in our debates on Northern Ireland. The Opposition do not undertake always to agree with him, but we will shall seek to encourage him in well doing.

My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) had every intention of being with us, but he was fog-bound this morning in Belfast. He hopes to join us shortly.

I hope that this will be a brief contribution to the debate. The Opposition have their differences with the Government in the context of Northern Ireland, and the list is growing, but this subject is not one of them.

The Bill is about electoral democracy and about ensuring that it functions properly and fairly. That would be of great importance anywhere, but at present I believe that it is probably of particular importance in Northern Ireland because there are people there who feel that democratic politics have not fulfilled their hopes, have not given effect to their aspirations and have not provided them with redress for their grievances. Whether that is true or not, it is a belief which could well be self-fulfilling. It is a necessary condition for a democratic political system to be effective that people should feel confident that it is effective; that it provides a fair and honest reflection of opinion; and that the right to vote is their most effective tool for improving their lot and redressing their grievances. It would be tragic if that confidence were to be further eroded. There is no other hope for the people of Northern Ireland. If they lose confidence in constitutional politics, they are left with nothing.

The need is to strengthen the links between the vote that people cast and the quality of the life which follows. I hope that before long the House will have an opportunity to consider the system of administration in Northern Ireland, because the one proposition that I believe would be assured of general assent in the House is that direct rule is an anaemic substitute for a more robust version of representative government. I hope that shortly the Government will report to the House the progress that has been made in exploring the alternatives. But any constitutional system will depend upon the confidence that people feel in the integrity of the electoral process.

The personation of electors on a wide scale is a poison which could destroy that process. That would be true of personation of the dead or of fictitious persons. It would destroy confidence in the essential characteristic of democracy—that all citizens have equal voting power and that each has one vote. It is even more destructive when it consists of the personation of living people who find that they are deprived of the right to vote.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): Stealing their votes.

Mr. Archer: It is stealing their votes. That right was hard won by the campaigners of earlier generations, and it should be thought of as a valued possession. For someone to be told, "Your vote has been stolen. It is something that you must accept with resignation. You have no remedy, but we can offer you the consolation prize of a tendered ballot paper," is to be seen as equivalent to being told, "The authorities do not think your vote is important." That is inconsistent with the assurance that hope for the future lies within a system of electoral democracy.

The fact that the problem of personation exists is not in dispute. In his report for 1982-83, the chief electoral registration officer referred to large numbers of allegations by polling agents of personation and, as the Secretary of State said, he referred to the number of tendered ballot papers and of the difficulty which some candidates have in some areas of persuading people to act as their polling agents. He spoke of the "perception of a high level of abuse."

The Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights, in its report of May 1984, spoke of evidence and perceptions that personation in recent elections had become more systematic.

Hon. Members will be contributing to the debate who are in a better position than I to assess the extent of the problem from their own experience. But of the countless numbers of people in Northern Ireland of all shades of opinion with whom I have spoken over the years no one has sought to conceal the existence of the problem. Personation is accepted as a feature of life. As the Secretary of State said, there are many stories and jokes circulating, and it is part of the folklore. It may be said that personation does not take place only in Northern Ireland —of course instances come to light from time to time on the mainland, but the difference lies in the surprise which they evoke and in the reaction of the people locally.

If an elector in my constituency were to arrive at the polling station to be told that he could not vote because the vote had already been excercised, he would be surprised and furious. He would come storming round to the committee room demanding that something be done about it. An unsuccessful candidate who had been prejudiced would consider presenting an election petition. The matter would be discussed widely and there would be great indignation.

I have the impression that in Northern Ireland personation appears to occasion no great surprise. Anyone who showed surprise would be regarded perhaps as a little naive. The reaction would probably be a resigned shrug of the shoulders. That is not a criticism of people in Northern Ireland. In any people, it is a virtue realistically to recognise that theory is not always reflected in the practice.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that if all presiding officers were more persuasive in ensuring that tendered ballot forms were completed when someone failed to exercise his vote who had the right to do so the record might be different?

Mr. Archer: That might be a solution to part of the problem. Of course, if people insisted on filling in tendered ballot papers that would give us better evidence of how widespread the problem was. But the fact that they do not also shows that abuse is accepted with a certain resignation. The evidence is that the abuse is growing and becoming more systematic.

Mr. Peter Robinson: The tenor of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks seems to be that a feeling of resignation has been built into the Northern Ireland electorate which is shown when people go to the polling station and find that their vote has been cast. It is right that they would not be altogether surprised at that, but I can tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman assuredly that they would be furious if it happened—perhaps more furious than people in Great Britain because it means so much more to them than it does to people over here.

Mr. Archer: I am grateful for that assurance. I hope that people would resent strongly the idea that their vote had been stolen. It is only that I learn from discussions that it is one of the facts of life and people say that there is probably not much that they can do about it, meaning not much that they can do about it unless the authorities take the initiative.

Mr. Hume: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is confusing two issues—personation and vote stealing. Personation has taken place traditionally in Northern Ireland, when people vote for the dead or someone who is absent. That is what the jokes are told about. What we are talking about today is an organised militaristic campaign on a wide scale to steal people's votes. That is different from what has gone on traditionally. That is why the Bill has been introduced.

Mr. Archer: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that distinction. It is a distinction that I was in the process of making, but my last words were lost in a succession of interventions.

I said that the evidence is that abuse is growing and, more important, is becoming more systematic. There is a distinction between personation of the dead and of living electors, and stealing votes. It cannot be said that the practice may not exist on a sufficient scale to affect the result of elections. The standing advisory commission said that at the general election in 1983 four constituencies in Northern ireland were won by majorities of fewer than 3,000. I have no reason to think that they were won otherwise than fairly, by genuine majorities, but in any future election, when the margins are so narrow, who is to say that the result may not be affected one way or the other by electoral abuse?

So I believe that there is a good case for introducing some measures of the sort proposed in the Bill. I am aware that there have been suggestions for a special document, an identity card that would have to be produced to obtain a ballot paper. I shall listen to the debate with an open mind, but my initial reaction is that most of us already have to obtain and take care of a wide range of documents and that to add one more to the number would be an unjustifiable burden.

I remember an occasion when I lost my wallet. I discovered that I was without my driving licence, my car insurance certificate, my cheque book, my banker's card, my fishing licence, my blood donor's card and my membership tickets of various organisations. I remember reflecting that I had gone out of existence—all my defining characteristics had been stripped from me. Fortunately, I did not lose my railway season ticket, my television licence, my identity pass to the House of Commons or my passport, because they were not in my wallet. But we live documented lives in a paper-ridden society. So the imposition of the burden of obtaining and safeguarding an additional document, with all the consequences that would follow from losing it or leaving it in one's other jacket, is to be avoided if possible.

I prefer the approach in the Bill. It was helpful of the Secretary of State to tell the House the list of documents that he has in mind to prescribe for the purpose. We can discuss that list subsequently. It would be reasonable if that list were discussed before the House was asked to give a final view on the Bill. But I accept that the object of the exercise is to compile a list sufficiently restrictive to make personation more difficult without making it difficult or impossible for bona fide electors to obtain a ballot paper. I welcome the provision that the documents which are produced will be confidential between the elector and the presiding officer.

I should like to fire a warning shot. I confess that when I read the somewhat draconian powers in clause 3(3) it occurred to me that I had read about similar powers on other occasions, when they caused anxiety in other contexts. The right of a police constable to stop and search a person on reasonable suspicion is a provision which we have met before. Of course, he would have to have a reasonable suspicion first that the person was in possession of a prescribed document which was forged, bore a false name or was in the name of someone other than the possessor and, secondly, that the possessor intended to use it for the purpose of committing the offence of personation. But suppose someone had in his possession his parent's pension book or had been asked by a friend to bring his driving licence because he intended to vote but had left it behind that morning. That person might be stopped in the vicinity of a polling station; he might be stopped and searched. Later we shall want some assurances that the use of those powers will be carefully monitored.

Finally, I should like to refer to the proposal in the Gracious Speech to extend the provisions for absent voting, which have already been mentioned in the debate. It appears that at the moment the Government are not minded to extend those provisions to Northern Ireland. That matter does not arise today. There will be other opportunities to discuss it and at this stage I should not like to express a final view. But the issue is not whether the citizens of Northern Ireland are to be treated fairly. We all lend our weight to that proposition. The question is whether it might be more unfair to subject electors in Northern Ireland to a restriction that does not apply elsewhere, or whether the unfairness would be harsher if they were subjected to an electoral system in which they had no confidence.

I noted carefully the remarks of the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) in the debate on the Gracious Speech, when he said that the electorate in Northern Ireland should enjoy the same franchise and the same opportunity to vote as electors elsewhere in the United Kingdom. The argument is that Northern Ireland should not be treated differently. The fact is that in several important respects it is different. It is different in the extent of the perception of electoral abuse. It is different in the strains from which the electoral system must be protected.

There have been occasions when it was I who argued that Northern Ireland should not be singled out for special treatment and that the citizens there should not be deprived of rights that were available to other United Kingdom citizens. On 5 July this year the House debated the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 (Continuance) Order. On that occasion the Opposition drew attention to the inroads that the Act had made upon the civil rights of citizens in Northern Ireland. I sought to persuade the House that the differences between the rights of citizens in Northern Ireland and those of people elsewhere in the United Kingdom should be reviewed to see whether the differences were justified. I failed to persuade the House. I failed to persuade several right hon. and hon. Members who are in attendance today.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The right hon. and learned Gentleman is not being any more successful today.

Mr. Archer: The hon. Gentleman may well be right. But none of us holds the view that Northern Ireland should always be treated differently, or that it should never be treated differently. It is not a question of high philosophic principle; it is a matter of judgment based on the evidence.

The Bill may be thought to be marginal to conversations about the future of Northern Ireland. The debate is not likely to go on record as being among the dramatic parliamentary occasions. I hope that shortly the House will be invited to debate matters such as the Baker report, the discussions consequent on the forum report and the economy of Northern Ireland. Nevertheless, it is an important Bill, and I hope that it will make a contribution to the healthy democratic way of life that we all wish for the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I beg to move, To leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

" this House, while desirous of checking electoral abuse in any part of the Kingdom and prepared to consider proposals to extend the responsibilities and powers of presiding officers, declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which offers no satisfactory means of establishing that a person requesting a ballot paper is in fact the elector who he claims to be."

Before arguing the case for the amendment, on behalf of all my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Ulster Unionist party I welcome the Secretary of State in his new position and to the Dispatch Box in his first appearance in that capacity. He has, of course, the disadvantage of having come very suddenly to the proposals that he had to put before the House and one was bound to sense that the background was not entirely familiar to him. The passage of time will remedy that difficulty and he may rely on my right hon. and hon. Friends to be available to afford him whatever advice and information we can.

The Bill concerns the entire United Kingdom. It would be absurd to claim that it does not. Any alteration in the conditions for voting in any part of the United Kingdom is the concern of all parts of the United Kingdom and of all Members of the House. It is impossible to say that there is any part of the kingdom in which anxieties do not or might not exist for the integrity of the electoral process. Indeed, in earlier debates we heard from Members representing areas as far apart as Wales and Leicestershire the asseveration that personation was not unknown there.

I associate myself with the claim of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights that "given that the potential for its abuse"— that is, abuse of the democratic process—

"is not peculiar to Northern Ireland some of the safeguards currently applied here together with the Commission's suggestions and recommendations could have a wider application."

Let hon. Members be assured that if we qualify or hedge the right of an elector in any part of the kingdom to receive a ballot paper, the matter will come home to roost in other parts of the United Kingdom. This debate and the considerations that apply to the Bill should be laid to heart by Members from all parts of the kingdom.

It would be the predisposition of any hon. Member to be prejudiced in favour of measures preventing electoral abuse. None of us stands to gain from it. None of us is in the business of electoral abuse. One starts prejudiced in favour of a measure laid before the House with the purpose of reducing the scope for electoral abuse. It is, therefore, with the more regret that my right hon. and hon. Friends and I, having studied as best we could not only the provisions of the Bill but the details that have been withheld from it — that is, the list of prescribed documents — have concluded that on balance the Bill will not be beneficial, that it will be onerous to the genuine elector without being effective in checking the abuses at which it is aimed.

We regret, therefore, that our advice to the House must be that the Bill should not be accepted in its present form. The whole matter should be reconsidered by the Government, not just in the light of the debates that will take place on the Bill but on maturer reflection.

It is puzzling that the Bill should have been brought forward with such pressure and haste. Its whole content and the manner of its presentation are redolent of haste and almost panic — ill counsellors in amending the fundamental law of the United Kingdom in so far as it concerns the representation of the people. There has been no real consultation on the contents of the Bill. I accept that there have been interchanges between the Government and various bodies in Northern Ireland, including the political parties, about electoral abuse; but the proposals contained in the Bill have never been submitted for consideration or criticism to any of those bodies. The House is being asked to consider these proposals for the first time in their present form.

Despite the comments of the Secretary of State, there is strikingly little evidence to support the urgency that has been advocated. In the same document from which the Secretary of State quoted, the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights stated:

"Any debate which has taken place seems to have relied on assumptions about Northern Ireland which have not been complemented by extensive consultations or by a careful examination of the facts."

I concede at once that in the nature of the case we cannot have full statistics on electoral abuse: the volume of abuse must be deduced from certain indirect indications. The Secretary of State did not seek to deny that. No relationship can be established between evidence such as that of tendered papers in the last election and the volume or importance of the general phenomenon of personation. Still less has any evidence been advanced to show that the volume of that abuse in the Province has increased. Views to the effect — observations to which the term "perceptions" is applied — are frequently heard and widely held; but evidence to justify approving the measures in the Bill on the ground that a growing practice must be checked immediately despite all difficulties has not been produced so far and was certainly not available in the speech of the Secretary of State.

At the root of the abuse with which the Bill is concerned lie two things. First, there is the identification of an individual: who is he? Secondly, there is the establishment of that individual, once identified, as the person entered in the electoral register as entitled to a vote. I believe that it is useful to keep those two separate indentifications apart in studying the Bill and in debating what is practicable and desirable.

The Government propose that no one should be permitted to vote without production of a document. That is the heart of the Bill. In Northern Ireland in the future the right to vote is to be qualified by the condition that it be exercised only on production of a document. Quite obviously, a Bill which has that profound effect can not only not be justified but cannot even be seriously debated unless the House has before it a statement of the documents to which that power is to be attached by the legislation.

The documents are not specified in the Bill. The Government could have written them into the Bill and still retained a power to vary and alter them subsequently by affirmative order. By failing to do so, the Government presented the House with a major proposal for changing the law without at the same time giving the House the basis on which to judge the validity and desirability of their proposal. True, the Minister, so far as he would within the exigencies of time — which I presume were not his choice but that of the managers of Government business — made available to hon. Members who sought enlightenment a proposed list of the prescribed documents in the form of notes on clauses, and I understand that these are available now in the Vote Office.

However, it is not good enough, when the case for the Bill depends on the nature of the documents to be prescribed, for us to be told that a list is available in the Vote Office and that we can debate the Bill without having it before us. So far as we can, my hon. Friends and I have sought to remedy this disability by putting down for Committee stage an amendment which writes those specifications into the Bill and thus makes it possible for us, when we consider the Bill in detail, to look at them one by one and consider what their effect would be if they were enacted.

I have one general statement to make about all the documents which have been suggested. Not one of them is a document which it is the duty of every citizen to hold. There will be citizens who, quite justifiably and properly, do not possess any one of those documents. So we are depriving electors of the right to vote for not possessing a document which they have no duty in law to possess. To put it the other way round, we are making the possession of a document which the citizen does not need to hold the condition of the exercise of his franchise.

That is the first objection to the proposal as it stands. In my view, it is a deeply serious objection. It illustrates my point that we need knowledge of the documents in order to judge the Bill, for if there were among them a document which every citizen has to possess, that difficulty would be be removed. As the list stands, it does not include a single document which every citizen is required by law to possess.

It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to say that my argument takes us in the direction of an identity card to be carried by all citizens, and that that is a bigger question. If he is not prepared to face the difficulty that the documents are documents which the citizen is not required to possess, he should reconsider the principle on which he has based his Bill.

I must now take the documents one by one. I will show that they do not in fact establish what we need to establish in order to prevent personation, bearing in mind the two identifications which have to be made—the identificaton of the individual presenting himself in the polling station, and the identification of that person with the elector specified on the electoral roll. Some of the documents bear no evidence of identity. They fail the first test. Some of them fail the second test, because they bear no evidence that the holder is the person specified on the register at a particular address. None of them satisfies both tests.

For instance, the Great Britain driving licence specifies the address of the holder but it does not carry a photograph. Again so far as I know, all the three passports mentioned carry a photograph of the holder but none of them contains his address. An allowance book—as I fear is too well known—contains the address of the lawful beneficiary but no evidence of his appearance or identification. Finally, the medical card not only contains no photograph of the holder but—as my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) may show — gives an address which probably far more frequently than not is not that currently occupied by the holder.

None of those defects is due to any offence committed by the holder or any unlawful omission on his part. It is not the fault of those who hold such documents if, in the respects which I have mentioned, they no longer include accurate evidence, for example, of the holder's address.

Taken as a whole, then, the documents do not provide the evidence which is required for the two essential identifications. I now invite the right hon. Gentleman to turn to the crucial provision in the Bill, which is contained in new paragraph (1B) of rule 37. I quote:

"Where a voter produces a prescribed document, the presiding officer . . . shall deliver a ballot paper to the voter unless the officer . . . decides that the document raises a reasonable doubt as to whether the voter is the elector or proxy he represents himself to be."

Let us suppose that my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann goes along to vote and takes his medical card, and that his card carries an address at which he no longer happens to reside. Does that raise he is the voter on the register? I would have thought that it was a defiance of the natural meaning of those words to deny "reasonable doubt" where a person claimed to vote as a particular elector at a particular address and produces a document which showed him as living somewhere else.

"a reasonable doubt as to whether"

It might be that neither the voter's Christian name nor his surname were rarities. They might both be very common indeed, either in general or—as is often the case in Northern Ireland—in that particular locality. The identification of the elector by the place where he lives is therefore a matter of extreme importance — the acid question. Yet here we have an enactment which states that if any one of the documents which the elector produces he is the person of that name living at that place, he will not be given a ballot paper.

"raises a reasonable doubt as to whether"

I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will tell me if I am mistaken, but to my belief the presiding officer asks the voter no question. Subject to correction, I understand that the presiding officer is not entitled under the law to ask the voter how it happens that the address on his document is not the address of the elector who he claims to be. Repeated rulings of the courts have declared that such inquiries are not within the power of a presiding officer. So the Bill enacts that, without making any further inquiry, the presiding officer must examine only the document

"unless the officer or clerk decides that the document raises a reasonable doubt".

The word is "the document"—the presiding officer is entitled to direct his attention to the document and nothing else. There is no suggestion that the elector can be given his ballot paper because an inquiry establishes that he lives at the address of the elector who he claims to be. The presiding officer will not ask him, "Tell me the name of the people who live at No. 27," or, "Do you know the name of the people who live opposite?". There will be no such investigation. If the document is not 100 per cent. evidence of the identity of that person—if it "raises a reasonable doubt"—the ballot paper will be withheld.

In the notes on clauses there are comforting references to the fact that the elector will be allowed to return home to try to find another document. I was extremely grateful to the draftsman of those notes for the assurance that an elector will be allowed to have a second go. One might almost have supposed that, at some time in the drafting of the Bill, provisions were discussed that would have prevented him from doing so.

I invite you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to a flight of imagination which does not take you beyond your personal experience. Imagine you are in a polling station at 9.45 pm. An elector, in all good faith, knowing that one of the documents he can bring with him is his medical card, produces it. The presiding officer, doing his duty, says, "This document raises a reasonable doubt whether you are the elector." He does so without looking at the elector or asking any questions. The elector says, "If you do not like it, I will go away and try to find another document". Will he get back in time to vote? Has he been denied his vote falsely and improperly? Yes, he has. That is what will happen on a massive scale as a result of the provisions of the Bill. People will be asked to produce documents which some of them, with every right and justification, do not possess. Others, who possess those documents, will discover that they do not meet the terms of the Bill.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): Is not the most astonishing aspect the fact that the presiding officer could look at my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) and say, "I know that you are Harold McCusker. My eyes tell me that, my personal knowledge tells me that, but the document does not tell me that, so go away." Is it not a fact that in Northern Ireland thousands of electors are known to presiding officers at every polling station, yet they will not be allowed to use the evidence of their eyes?

Mr. Powell: I take my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Hume: They are not legislating for common sense.

Mr. Powell: I take the point of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) also. Common sense would indeed dictate that the presiding officer should use his knowledge and ask such questions as he thought fit to elicit whether an imposition was being attempted; but the law prevents that—the requirements of the legislation are clear and specific.

A simple conclusion can be drawn from all this as to the direction in which we should improve our electoral law in future. We must find a way of escaping from the nonsense of presiding officers putting the statutory questions to a person who asks for a ballot paper and then being obliged to give it him although they know the answer was a lie. It is called a "satisfactory" answer if it is either yes or no, as the case may be—that is the meaning of art of the word "satisfactory" in this context. Under the law at present, if those statutory questions are answered—however manifestly untruthfully they are answered—the ballot paper must still be delivered. I see no direction in which we can make progress—and progress must be made not only in Northern Ireland but in other parts of the United Kingdom to preserve the integrity of the electoral process — unless we are prepared to give presiding officers responsibility for satisfying themselves that the person to whom they give a ballot paper is the person intended by the entry in the electoral roll to have a vote.

Only one thing can be done wisely with the Bill. The Government should take it away and reconsider the whole matter. We shall have an opportunity in Committee—commencing next week, though there is no assurance of that stage being completed next week—of discussing in more detail the meaning of the provisions and the nature and consequences of the documents which are proposed to be specified.

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman is under no obligation as a Back-Bench Member to put forward a positive proposal, but I have listened carefully to his analysis and to his criticisms. Is it his conclusion, according to his perceptions, that there is no real need for such a measure, or is it his conclusion that a measure is needed, but that it must rest on a completely different basis, including a special document that would in effect be an identity card?

Mr. Powell: My propositions are—this is a resumé—first, that whatever is necessary is necessary for all electors in all parts of the United Kingdom; there should be assurance of the integrity of the electoral process throughout the United Kingdom. Secondly, we must entrust presiding officers with a discretion that is at present withheld from them by law. Thirdly, if we believe that that is not satisfactory and that there must also be documentary certification of identity, such certification must be binding and compulsory on all citizens, as otherwise we shall create an injustice by the Bill, an injustice between one citizen and another as well as between the citizens of one part of the United Kingdom and those of the rest of the United Kingdom. I hoped that I had not left those conclusions in any doubt by my argument, but I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for eliciting the restatement from me.

When the Secretary of State has heard argument, not only today but in Committee, on the details of the Bill, he should recognise that it will be oppressive to the genuine elector—perhaps on a massive scale—without being effective. He should take it away and after more thought has been given, deal with this problem in the wider context of legislation on the representation of the people in the United Kingdom as a whole.

5.18 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): I join my colleagues in wishing the Secretary of State well in his appointment. I should say that I was not a party to a resolution in the Northern Ireland Assembly calling for him to return home immediately he was appointed, as other Members were, but that is only by the way. He will know already that the representatives of Northern Ireland will speak their minds to him forthrightly and fully.

I agree with the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) that the Bill was conceived in great haste. I can illustrate that. I do not wish to repeat anything that has been said because many hon. Members wish to take part in the debate. All the notes on clauses, except one, have been commented on by the right hon. Member for South Down, and I wish to deal with that one. It is evident that the person who drew up this Bill was divorced from the reality of the situation in Northern Ireland. The Secretary of State should know that, when a marriage takes place in a church building, and the officiating minister issues a marriage certificate, the Registrar General for Northern Ireland knows nothing about it for three months, until the marriage return is given to him.

Therefore, a woman can get married and change her name. She goes along to the presiding officer to cast her vote and she has her marriage certificate from the minister, which is the only certificate that she can have inside a three-month period, and she has her medical card. The presiding officer says that the certificate is not from the Registrar General for Northern Ireland and, according to the Bill, a marriage certificate issued by the Registrar General for England and Wales, for Scotland or for Northern Ireland is what is required. It would be impossible for that woman to have such a certificate inside a three-month period.

The people of Northern Ireland who are married in the churches of Northern Ireland get their marriage certificates from the minister who officiates at the ceremony. Any minister knows how often, in cases of pensions, death and unemployment benefit, the people come directly to him to get the necessary certificate. Therefore, the person who drew up the Bill was completely divorced from what is happening in Northern Ireland.

Mr. McCusker: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, in all probability, the lady in question does not require marriage lines to justify to the presiding officer that she is the entry on the register, because the entry is in her maiden name and she is still that person, even if her name has changed? She would probably have ample evidence to show that that is still the case.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I agree, but I am dealing with what the Bill is saying, and it makes a laughing stock of the position in Northern Ireland. It means that the House is asked to accept something that is not a part of real life in Northern Ireland. If we are dealing with certificates and documents, let us deal with them as they are in Northern Ireland. Let us not have an English, Scottish or Welsh situation introduced into Northern Ireland, as if that is what happens there as well. I know that nonconformist churches have a different form of registration of marriages, but all this shows that the Bill has been conceived in great haste. We have only just finished debating the Queen's Speech, and the next day we are rushed in to the Bill, and that makes me wonder.

Mr. Hume: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is a serious problem of electoral abuse in Northern Ireland? If he does accept that, what measures does he propose to deal with it?

Rev. Ian Paisley: If the hon. Gentleman waits a little, he will discover my view, which has already been given in writing to the previous Secretary of State. I have a firm view on this matter, about which the new Secretary of State should know. I am dealing with an important point about these documents. If there is any sense in the legislation that we are asked to pass, that legislation should help to deal with the problem mentioned by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume). I suggest that this Bill will not help at all but will hinder.

The House should be encouraging the people of Northern Ireland to go to the ballot box more. It is difficult to get people to vote in Northern Ireland, for the simple reason that they say that the House of Commons does not recognise what the ballot box says. That is said over and over again. People ask what is the use of voting. If the hon. Gentleman knows anything about Northern Ireland, he will know that that is asked by his supporters as well as by the supporters of other parties. People should be encouraged to vote and should not be hindered in their desire to do so.

Legislation such as this will discourage people from voting for the simple reason that the document concerned, which may be the right document, may raise reasonable doubt in the mind of the presiding officer, instead of helping the presiding officer to give the voter a ballot paper, and he will have to follow the law and not give a ballot paper. It would be terrible if the House discouraged voting patterns in the Province.

I had serious misgivings about the Bill, but after listening to the Secretary of State I have more. The House needs to know before Tuesday what the documents are. On Tuesday, we go into Committee on the Floor of the House, but we shall be in ignorance of what the documents are. How can we be asked to deal with this matter in Committee if we do not know that? It is important that we should know before Tuesday.

It is no use us knowing what the documents are when the Bill goes to the other place, nor if we are told that we shall hear about them as the parliamentary procedures continue. That will mean that when the Bill is discussed in the other place, we shall hear, having finished our discussions, what the regulations will be. The House needs to know now, and the Secretary of State should give us an assurance that we shall know what we are passing, so that we may discuss it in a proper manner.

It is deplorable that we have the present position in Northern Ireland. That highlights the fact that the House, and successive Governments, have failed to deal with law and order in Northern Ireland. The Secretary of State has told us that this legislation is to deal with the actions of Sinn Fein and the Provisional IRA. He has said that it is not the constitutional parties that are responsible for the problem, but Sinn Fein and the IRA.

If the IRA had been dealt with properly by the Government, and if proper actions had been taken by the Government, we should not have to discuss legislation such as this tonight. There is no doubt that we need to emphasise this because a serious situation has arisen in Northern Ireland. There is no doubt that in areas where Sinn Fein and the IRA—they are one and the same and we do not need to make a distinction between them—have a strong following, although not necessarily a majority, they intimidate the voters. They also put pressure on those who represent the other candidates in an election. That is important, because candidates have polling agents in the electoral booths to look after their interests and to see that those who are voting are proper voters.

I know that pressure is put on individuals. The people who go into the polling booths as agents for the candidates must be well known in the area. They are of little use if they are not well known. They must know practically everyone in the area, and they must be able to discern whether a would-be voter is acting rightly.

In the quiet comfort of the House hon. Members may not realise it, but sitting in a polling booth, seeing a person come in who is known to be attached to the IRA and known to have been into the booth before, for anyone to open his mouth and say so is to invite a petrol bomb that night or a member of his family being shot. Those are the facts of life that we have to face.

I salute those who are prepared to undertake the task of acting as polling agents in elections. When I started electioneering in Ulster there were polling booths into which I put people which I would not dream of doing today. I would not risk their lives. No election is worth a life. There are polling booths in my constituency which I used to visit during elections that I would not visit today in case I caused trouble to individuals in the area. Those are the facts of life brought about by successive Governments not facing the truth.

We have that situation today, and very serious it is. If we are to rectify it, the IRA nettle has to be grasped. I do not understand how an organisation can one day be proscribed and the next day be legal and free to go about its business. The leadership of Sinn Fein is the leadership of the IRA, and the actions of Sinn Fein are typical of actions of the IRA. There is no difference between them. I have made a study of the position on the ground, and I find that those who lead the Provisional IRA are those who lead Sinn Fein. They have a joint leadership.

The Government should do something about the IRA and Sinn Fein. There is no reason why they should not say that Sinn Fein is proscribed, because it is in reality part of the IRA set-up.

Coming to the matter with which the Bill seeks to deal, I stress that it must be dealt with in a practical and sensible way that grasps the nettle. The only way that that can be done is to have a proper method of identifying the would-be voter. If there is no proper way of doing so, the whole exercise is abortive. I suggest to the Secretary of State that none of the documents that he has mentioned will give a proper, realistic identification. That is why I have to condemn this proposal. It will not succeed.

I hope that the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) will take note of what I am saying. We are discussing a very important measure. There is a problem, and it needs to be grappled with, but the only way to do it is to have a proper means of establishing a person's identity.

How is that to be done? There has to be a proper identity card bearing a photograph of the holder, his description, his present address and his signature. What is more, when anyone votes with that card there has to be a way of marking or punching it so that it cannot be used again in the same election.

We are told that that cannot be done. If we are not prepared to do it, we are unable to deal with the situation. If we say no to that, any other way is putting an onus on the presiding officer, who will not be able to do his job properly.

As for the mechanics of the Government's proposal, how long will it take to vote in Northern Ireland under this system? A person arrives in the polling booth, he gives his name and number and he is then asked what document he has. Most would-be voters will say that they did not know they needed any documents. Frequently they do not even know the names of the candidates, let alone the document that is required from them. I hope that part of the mechanism will be to put the names of candidates before the electorate. But the presiding officer can say to such a person, "It is all right. You have come in good faith, but you cannot produce any document which I can say is a prescribed document. Such voters as you raise a reasonable doubt in my mind, but I will permit you to go away and, if you wish, you may reapply some time later for a ballot paper by producing one of the prescribed documents."

That is all very well, but there is only one qualification for the franchise. It is that a person must be over 18 years of age and on the electoral roll. Now we are changing that. We are saying that we shall have a different way in Northern Ireland and that anyone who is unable to produce one of the necessary documents cannot vote.

How much time will it take? The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) talked about people voting before 10 pm. But in Northern Ireland elections we do not vote from 7 am until 10 pm. That applies to parliamentary elections, of course, but in local elections and Assembly elections voting is only allowed between 8 am and 8 pm. The right hon. Member for South Down spoke of an elector coming to the polling booth at a quarter to 10, but in the case of a local election it would have to be at a quarter to eight. There is less time for voting. What is to happen if there is a queue of people down the road claiming to have the necessary documents? Will they be unable to get into the polling booth after it is due to close? The first to shout about that if it happened would be the hon. Member for Foyle. We all know that people in Northern Ireland do not vote early. The peak voting period is round about tea time.

What about this time factor? Will the Secretary of State assure us that there will be more ballot boxes and more workers in polling booths? I can assure him that we shall need twice the number of workers and twice the number of polling stations that we have in an ordinary election. Will the Secretary of State give that undertaking? According to the Bill not much money is to be spent on the Government's proposal.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the time scale is further shortened by the fact that under the Stormont Electoral Law Act, under which local government and Assembly elections are held, presiding officers take it upon themselves to instruct the policeman on duty outside polling stations not to admit people so that they may queue inside in the remaining few hours before the polls close?

Rev. Ian Paisley: Anyone shut out remains shut out even though he may have been there before the appointed time. If there is a queue, people are not allowed into a polling station.

Are we to have extra time? Will polling in Northern Ireland be from 7 am to 10 pm, as it is for elections to this House? Will the hours be even longer, because there will be awful delay in getting the necessary documents presented and moving people towards the ballot boxes?

By a law passed by the House the voting arrangements for local government elections and Assembly elections in Northern Ireland are different. They are not one-seat constituencies. It takes longer to vote. People are not voting for just one candidate. There are possibly 20 candidates, and even more in local government elections. Voting takes a long time. I remember a former Prime Minister, now Lord Wilson of Rievaulx, talking about devolution for Wales and Scotland and saying that the people of Wales and Scotland would be confused and therefore that it was not possible to bring on proportional representation. I congratulate the people of Northern Ireland on being wise enough to be able to use proportional representation. But it takes longer and every hon. Member from Northern Ireland knows that.

What can be done about the time factor? The Government must face up to the problem. Or do they not want the people of Northern Ireland to vote? We have to face up to that. Northern Ireland will be kept on the right path only if the people are given the opportunity to exercise their franchise properly. If that is taken away we shall be in serious trouble.

I and my colleagues will be voting for the reasoned amendment tonight. We are not saying that there is no problem. Let it not be said that Unionists of all sections said that there is no problem. We know the problem from a point of view different from that of the hon. Member for Foyle. We know what happens in areas of divide such as Toome, Dunloy and the Glens, and those areas where we no longer put people into polling stations because of threats and intimidation. I can well understand the situation that people who represent his party face. I know what is happening.

Let it not be said that we do not think there is a problem. There is. But the only way to deal with it is in the way that I have suggested. If it is not dealt with in that way, at the end of the day all those documents will only make matters more difficult for the presiding officer and for the person who believes in the ballot box and wants legally to exercise his franchise. I appeal to the Government to have second thoughts on the matter and face up to the reality of the situation.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I, too, welcome the Secretary of State to his new post. If he is not in despair already, I shall be surprised. I thought that this was an enabling measure and a Second Reading debate. But it appears that, because the Government have been generous enough to suggest various documents, the proposals are being torn to ribbons already.

I speak in ignorance in as much as I have never—thank God—been in Northern Ireland during a general or local election. I have enough problems in my constituency. Therefore, I do not propose to speak with any confidence that I shall get any of the facts right about election time in Northern Ireland. But it is true to say that the chief electoral officer, Mr. Bradley, has instigated considerable improvements in procedures over the past few years. As we recognise from the Secretary of State's comments, there was not quite so much abuse in the European elections last year.

I was surprised to hear the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) say that people in North Ireland do not turn out to vote. They certainly turned out to vote in vaster numbers than in the rest of the United Kingdom during the European elections. Some loopholes have been closed, but it seems to be accepted that there is need for further action. Therefore, albeit reluctantly, I agree that the measure before us today is required.

I am interested in what has been said about the documents themselves. If the matter does not come up in Committee on Tuesday it will surely be coming in the affirmative resolution which will come before the House in due course. I want to throw out a suggestion which will probably be shot down in flames. Surely checks should be made when the registers are prepared, which I believe is now done by the political parties in Northern Ireland. Is there not some way in which a polling card could be validated before electors go to the polls? If the electoral register is right and people then have to get their polling cards and have them validated, that may be one way round the problem.

If we are to reintroduce identity cards, and if the speech of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) is taken on board and they apply throughout the United Kingdom, surely everybody in the House will say that the rest of the United Kingdom will be completely opposed to the introduction of identity cards. General opinion would be against it. It would be far too drastic.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): The hon. Gentleman is a great believer in the EC. Do not other member states of the EC use identity cards? Is not the identity card which we as hon. Members carry a great convenience and protection of ourselves as well as of the public interest? Why does he object to a document with a photograph and a signature which can clear up all kinds of difficulties for the citizen?

Mr. Ross: Well, I am opposed to it, and I think that the hon. Gentleman will find that public opinion in Britain would be opposed to it as well. I remember, as he will, because he is probably of my age, the joy with which we burnt our identity cards after the last world war. There would be just as much outrage over their reintroduction as over the abolition of the £1 note.

On the whole, the list of prescribed documents seems adequate, but I accept that points have been made which should be taken on board in Committee and when the affirmative motion is before the House.

There is provision of some £50,000 for equipment in the polling stations and £45,000 for additional staff. That should cover some of the arguments of the hon. Member for Antrim, North. Surely it would not be difficult to change the polling hours. Why can we not extend polling hours to 9 or 10 o'clock if it will take longer to vote? I am aware that there have been impersonations. What has been going on in some parts of Northern Ireland has been described to me. Some 14-year-olds have masqueraded as people much older. However, despite the additional bureaucracy, this is a worthwhile measure and I shall certainly support it.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): We should recognise at the beginning that the Bill is about the protection of the right to vote in Northern Ireland, which has come under fairly serious threat in recent elections. Every hon. Member who has spoken accepts that it is a serious problem. My party in particular has had to face the problem at its most serious.

At the moment the only protectors of the right to vote in Northern Ireland are party agents in polling stations who have to challenge people who come in who they think are not the persons on the register. There has been a fairly sustained and widespread attempt in recent elections to steal votes in an organised fashion.

In my constituency in the previous election we kept a record of such attempts. In each polling station there were about 700 voters. By lunch time on election day in the stations where that check was carried out my agents had turned away an average of 50 voters per booth. They were turned away, not arrested, so they do not appear on the record. In addition, in many areas of Northern Ireland such people were not stopped. People who do such work are subject to intimidation. As everybody knows, SDLP workers' homes were attacked after that election to ensure that they would not sit in polling booths in future. It is wrong to place on ordinary people the responsibility of protecting the right to vote. There is a duty on hon. Members to produce the means to do so. I hope that the argument today is not about the principle but about the means and the objectives.

Some doubts have been raised about the particular measures proposed. We have discussed the problem with the Secretary of State and his predecessor. What is proposed today is not a perfect or foolproof system of preventing voting abuse, but it substantially reduces the possibility.

I also hope that it is only a temporary measure because there is a much more foolproof method of stopping voting abuse. I recognise the urgency of what is put forward. It is the only way to deal with the problem before next year's local elections. When talking about local elections and proportional representation in Northern Ireland, one is talking about seats being won on 50 to 100 votes. Therefore, the Bill has a major importance for local government elections and some action must be taken before next May. This is the only action that can be taken before May.

However, I urge the Secretary of State to realise that the best way of controlling vote-stealing is at the point of registration. A voter who registers for a vote is not asked his date of birth; he is merely asked to state that he is over 18. He ought to be asked to state his date of birth and sign his application for a vote. A copy of his signature and his date of birth could be given to the presiding officer and that would be a foolproof system of preventing vote-stealing without burdening people with the methods that have been proposed today.

I ask the Secretary of State to include such a system in the Bill for the future registration of voters. I agree that there are loopholes in the proposed system, but it is the best that can be done, bearing in mind the urgency of dealing with the problem.

Mr. William Ross: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that instead of the head of the household filling in a form for his household every year, each individual elector should have to apply for a vote?

Mr. Hume: Yes. That is precisely what I am saying.

5.51 pm

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): I favour the objectives of the Bill. Unlike some hon. Members, I have personal experience of the abuses that occur.

However, two activities in Northern Ireland have acquired a mythology—smuggling and personation. We all have our favourite stories. We repeat them, they become exaggerated and eventually form the folklore referred to in the background documentation provided by the Secretary of State.

Not long ago a Parliamentary Under-Secretary who was asked about control of the border told us that there was no way that the border could be controlled and cited in support of his claim the fact that smuggling had been going on for centuries. He forgot that the border had existed for only 55 years. That Minister was taken in by the mythology.

Much of what is said about personation is exaggerated, and I regret that some of the comments in this debate will contribute to the mythology and the folklore. The background documentation uses such words as "overwhelming impression" and "much folklore". It says that there are no figures to support claims of widespread personation, but adds that any figures might represent only the tip of the iceberg. The documents refer to reports of extensive abuse at the Assembly elections, the general election of 1983 and the European elections of 1984. I hope that we can dispel some of that mythology.

There is abuse, but increasingly it exists only in isolated locations in specific constituencies. In many areas, personation, as distinct from vote-stealing, never occurs.

I am worried that attempts to eliminate abuse in some areas may have damaging and drastic effects on ordinary people seeking to exercise their right to vote. Perhaps we should try merely to reduce personation and vote-stealing rather than to eliminate them.

Until the early 1970s, "benign" personation was practised by both parties in Northern Ireland. Both parties abided by certain unwritten rules. The voting registers were seen to include Unionist and Nationalist voters. Party activists put people's names on the register and felt that they had a duty to ensure that all the votes were cast.

If sickness, death, holidays, changes of employment or people moving house meant that some voters were not able to vote, the enthusiasts felt obliged to ensure that those votes were cast. I do not justify that practice, but it was carried out by both parties in most elections.

As I said, we all have our favourite stories. Early in my active involvement in politics, a woman who had buried her husband the previous day came to the caravan where I was acting as a tallyman and handed in her late husband's papers. Tearfully, she said, "I know Willie John would have wanted his vote cast." There was no way that any of us could tell her that she could not do that. She did not think that she was doing anything wrong. She merely thought that fate had denied her husband the opportunity to do his duty and that it was incumbent upon her to ensure that that duty was performed. I am sure that it was performed.

I also recall a little old lady aged about 67, with white hair and bright rosy cheeks, coming to a polling station and saying, "My granddaughter has the same name as me, but she went to university last week. I have already voted at another polling station, but is there anything to stop me from voting for my granddaughter?" I said that there were plenty of things to stop her, but there was no stopping her. When she came out of the polling station five minutes later, her face was rosier than it had been when she went in. I asked her what happened and she said, "They told me that I was too young to vote." She had forgotten that her granddaughter, whose name was on the register, had not reached the qualifying voting age.

Those sort of stories contribute to the mythology and become the basis of jokes and anecdotes. Many hon. Members accept it as a fact that there is widespread personation throughout Northern Ireland. That view is accepted in The Economist this week. It talks of the "spoilsport" Government interfering in yet another hallowed Ulster tradition and says:

> "But the Province's democratic parties, most of which have in the past won seats with bogus votes, will unite to support the change. They fear the electoral impact of Sinn Fein, the political wing of the Irish Republican Army."

I dispute the claim that any political party ever won a seat as a consequence of personation. If that were true, surely all the academic investigations conducted into Northern Ireland affairs over the past 15 years would have produced some proof. But that has not happened. The truth is that the benign personation was invariably a waste of time. The votes cast usually cancelled each other out, and the hackles of activists were raised only when someone broke the rules. Over the years, various parties would kick up a fuss about personation if they lost the election. That was almost part of the game as well. But they never thought it worth while to pursue it much further than that. However, things have changed because Sinn Fein has broken the rules and has engaged in vote-stealing on a massive scale. That is "malign" personation. By and large, the other type of personation was accepted. There were ground rules, and it had little effect. However, this vote-stealing is different. There can be no doubt but that party activists are very concerned about it.

Nevertheless, vote-stealing does not take place throughout the Province. It is no doubt practised in Belfast, West, Fermanagh and South Tyrone, Mid-Ulster and perhaps in Foyle and to some extent in Newry and Armagh, but that is only five constituencies out of 17. In most of the Province the attitude towards benign personation has changed. Most people think that it is a waste of time and that it performs no useful function. They are also beginning to realise that the rest of the world frowns on such behaviour, and they do not want to belittle themselves by engaging in it.

In my experience such vote-stealing is virtually confined to Sinn Fein. It is highly organised and extremely refined. I worked on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) in the first by-election that he fought. I went into polling stations in Coalisland and Washing Bay where no Unionists voted or could be put in to act as polling agents. What I saw there shocked me to the core. I could not believe that there could be abuse on such a scale. Of course, the Sinn Fein activists were simply stealing the votes of their co-religionists. They were stealing not Unionist but Roman Catholic votes. One family after another would arrive at the polling station only to be told that their votes had already been cast. They would momentarily fly into a rage and then look at the Sinn Fein representative in the polling station. When they were asked whether they wanted to make a complaint they shrugged their shoulders and left. I witnessed that in both Washing Bay and Coalisland.

Later that evening I went to Dungannon, having been disgusted at what I had seen earlier in the day. It was not the stealing of votes that revolted me as much as the total disregard for the democratic process. In a school in Dungannon I watched young Sinn Fein activists being rugby tackled along the corridors as they raced out of the various booths where they had been challenged. Some of the party workers who were there on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone thought that it was tremendous that those people were being caught. Indeed, substantial numbers were caught, but for every one caught, perhaps six or seven got away. When I was asked why I was not smiling I had to say that it was because I was watching people who did not give a fig for the democratic process and were systematically exploiting its weaknesses. As far as they were concerned, they would exploit it when it suited them, with the objective of destroying it.

Therefore, I have personal experience of vote-stealing, and I have no doubt that it also occurs in the other constituencies. Let us consider what has happened during the recent elections in Northern Ireland. I disagree with something that the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) said. Personation does not have the same impact on elections using proportional representation as on first-past-the-post elections. At the most, it could affect the election result in so far as one out of five, one out of six or one out of seven candidates would be elected who would not otherwise have been. However, in a first-past-the-post election, the situation could be completely altered and the wrong person could be elected. The effectiveness of personation is therefore reduced when proportional representation is used. I have not given the matter much thought, but I should imagine that the more personation, the higher the quota. Therefore it can have an adverse effect on one's objective.

We have heard that it is thought that massive personation took place during the 1982 election for the Assembly. On that occasion, for every person who voted in Antrim, South, one person did not vote. There was a 52 per cent. poll there. In Antrim, North, for every six people who voted, or thereabouts, more than four people did not vote, because there was only a 57 per cent. poll. The figures are: in Belfast, North a 59 per cent. poll; in Belfast, South a 61 per cent. poll; in Belfast, East a 54 per cent. poll and in North Down a 53 per cent. poll. There were several constituencies with reasonable percentage rates in the sixties. Once again, only two constituencies had figures that showed that there might have been abuse. In Fermanagh and South Tyrone there was an 83 per cent. poll and in mid Mid-Ulster a 75 per cent. poll

But with the exception of those two constituencies, how can it be argued that massive personation occurred on a scale that changed the results? As the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) said, we should be concerned that the results show that the people of Northern Ireland are turning away from the ballot box. I hope that the Minister will produce some evidence to show that, with the exception of the two constituencies that I have mentioned, there was massive and systematic personation. If he cannot produce such evidence, he is inflicting conditions on the other constituencies that will mean that a greater number of people will be deterred or prevented from voting than lost their votes through the abuses that have occurred in the other two constituencies.

Let us consider the percentages for the 1983 general election. In some ways they were higher than for the 1982 election, but the bulk of them fell within the same range as existed on the mainland, and ranged from 64 per cent. to something in excess of 74 per cent. However, there are one or two constituencies that stand out. As one might imagine, Fermanagh and South Tyrone had an 88 per cent. poll. Mid-Ulster had an 84 per cent. poll, Foyle a 77 per cent. poll, Londonderry, East a 76 per cent. poll and South Down a 76 per cent. poll. But even then there were only six constituencies with percentages higher than 75 per cent. Only two of them perhaps give cause for concern that abuse might have taken place. The results, which are similar to those on the mainland, surely do not illustrate massive and systematic personation, or vote-stealing throughout the Province.

It is vital that we should not overestimate or over-react. Does anyone really suggest that, with the exception of those two constituencies, abuse is so great as to have affected the outcome of those two elections in total terms? I believe that personation is likely to affect only first-past-the-post elections. There is only one such election left in Northern Ireland, and that is to the House. Most people in Northern Ireland feel most strongly about that election and I think that that is why there was an increase in the poll in 1983. The people of Northern Ireland know that it is important to vote in general elections, and they turn out with greater enthusiasm and in greater numbers than for any other elections.

We are considering the effects of the abuse, which is limited, and the consequences of Sinn Fein exploiting its total vote. If that is a correct analysis, is the Bill the proper way to deal with it? I think that it is not.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is there not an increasing real Sinn Fein vote?

Mr. McCusker: Yes, Sinn Fein does have a real increased vote. That vote has always existed potentially but Sinn Fein supporters did not exercise their franchise because it did not suit them at various times in the past 50 or 60 years.

The likely effect of the Bill will be to reduce personation and vote-stealing, but it will also deter, discourage and prevent some people from voting who would want to vote and whose vote would probably affect the outcome of elections. The Bill removes one vote-stealing exercise and substitutes another. That is the only conclusion to which one can come in the light of the statistics for the 1982 and 1983 elections.

Democracy is important. It is important to the people of Northern Ireland. In the last 12 years democracy has been threatened in Northern Ireland. Only recently have I realised how fragile it is in Northern Ireland. If people had realised how fragile it was in the early 1970s we might have been in an even more dangerous position.

Most people in Northern Ireland thought that democracy was cut into tablets of stone which were handed down and that the instruments of government must be observed. That is not so. The instruments of government are there only because people give their consent to them. We give our consent in the secrecy of the polling booth. We show our acquiesence to being governed and we make our choice about who should govern us or represent us. The right to vote in the Province, as in the rest of the United Kingdom, is the cornerstone of our democracy.

We should be glad that so many people in Northern Ireland still believe in the democratic process, although some of the poll figures cause concern. Whether or not they exercise their right to vote, Northern Ireland people are jealous of that right and of being on the electoral register. To believe that one has only to witness their reaction if they are not on the register, if they do not have a postal vote or if their vote is stolen. They blame the politicians and the political parties. We should be careful not to undermine what is left of the base and foundation of our democracy by interfering with people's cherished rights.

The Statutory Advisory Commission on Human Rights said in chapter 5 of a recent report:

"Members agreed, as a matter of principle, that they disapproved of it being mandatory for voters to produce specific documents as proof of their identity, and they were also of the opinion that it was naive to assume that personators could not acquire these documents for illegal use . . . It should also be emphasised that documents would not be the sole means of proving identity."

I wonder whether the members of that commission have changed their minds because in last year's report they reviewed the position. Did they volunteer a change in opinion or were they unduly influenced? If they changed their opinion, why did they?

[Mr. McCusker]

The Bill was produced as a reaction to Sinn Fein and it is likely to deprive at least some of our people of their rights as it attempts to prevent vote-stealing by Sinn Fein. The full implications have not been thought through.

One of the most chilling comments in the notes on clauses is on page 12 which states:

"no-one will lose the right to be on the electoral register".

Sinn Fein does not threaten anyone's right to be on the electoral register. The document continues:

"But it could result in some people not being able to vote who otherwise would have done, for example if they did not have a document prescribed under rule 37(1A) . . . when they went to the polling station."

The document continues:

"the theoretical possibility exists that on polling day an elector who would otherwise be entitled to vote would not have one of those documents."

That is a casual way to deal with one of the fundamental rights of our people.

The main thrust of the Bill seems to be to ensure that only those who can produce one of a number of documents will be allowed to vote. I believe that anyone who can prove to the satisfaction of the presiding officer that he is the person on the electoral register should be allowed to vote. The right to vote under the Bill is conditional on the production of a document as distinct from proving that the person is the person on the register and has a legitimate right to vote. There is a vast difference because many people will be able to produce a document which will enable them to vote when they are not the person entitled to vote.

My right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) referred to me in his speech. My right hon. Friend will have a mainland Great Britain driving licence, to which no photograph is attached. As I read the Bill, someone who managed to acquire that driving licence by stealing it from a car or picking it up somewhere could go to the polling station and say to the presiding officer, "I am Enoch Powell. There is my driving licence to prove it." The presiding officer would then have to decide whether the document shows that the person in front of him is Enoch Powell. I cannot see how that person can be refused a ballot paper.

We are in danger of giving people the right to vote on the basis of a document and depriving people of the right to vote simply because they do not have a document. I am sure that it will be equally possible to prove beyond doubt that one is entitled to vote and not be given a vote.

I could go along to a polling station without documentation, but be able to prove who I was and where I lived and produce a House of Commons pass. Under the Bill the presiding officer would be obliged to say, "I am sorry, we cannot give you a ballot paper. Go back and acquire one of the prescribed documents." That is incredible. I hope that the Government will reconsider.

Let us look in more detail at the Bill. I have asked questions about driving licences. I asked how many full driving licences with photographs were held in Northern Ireland, and I was told that the figure was a little more than 500,000. Therefore, about half the people on the register could produce a document that would identify them, which would go some way to preventing some abuses.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that provisional licences would be as good as full licences?

Mr. McCusker: That may be the case, but there are remarkably few provisional licences available in Northern Ireland. About 500,000 people do not have driving licences, so they could not produce one when voting. Driving licences are not a sufficient means of identification. Passports could be used, but when I asked the Secretary of State how many passports were held by United Kingdom citizens resident in Northern Ireland, he said, "We do not know." I was also unable to establish how many people hold Irish Republic passports. I understand that fewer people hold Irish Republic passports —fewer than the hon. Member for Foyle would want to believe, but more than Unionist Members would want to believe.

What about the case of a Unionist living in a strong Nationalist area? That person might not want to show his passport on polling day. He might be living quietly in the area, with no one knowing a great deal about him. People will soon know something about him if he has to produce his British passport to vote.

What about a decent, law-abiding Catholic—which most of them are—perhaps working in the Civil Service —as most of them do—carrying a British passport? If that person was voting in Washing Bay, and was a well-liked and respected member of the Catholic community, the production of a British passport would put him in some difficulty. Similarly, a Roman Catholic living in a Loyalist area—again a respected and accepted member of the community — would be expected to hold a British passport. If he produced an Irish passport when he voted, that would be telling many people in the community a great deal about him.

We all know about the abuses of DHSS documents in Northern Ireland, where people obtain funds by fraudulent means. Yet those documents are accepted as proof of identity when money is handed out. Officials accept that the document belongs to the person because it is in his possession. Large sums of money are often involved. Anyone producing such a document at a polling station will have it accepted as identification.

I have a medical card with me. It gives my name—James H. McCusker of 42 Wellington street, Lurgan. It also gives the name of my doctor, R. Pedlow, 60 High street, Lurgan. Because the card has been in use for some time, it has a hole in the middle, so the "H" is not visible. I left that address 20 years ago, and left the following address 10 years ago. The doctor died 20 years ago.

At no time have I suffered because I have not had the card altered. I have always received more than adequate medical attention. There was no incentive to amend the card. I have no incentive to amend it now, other than that I might need it at a polling station because my House of Commons pass will not be accepted as identification.

Both the medical card and DHSS documents are of no real value to someone trying to prove his identity, but they can be of value to someone intent upon personating. I looked at some of my registers. I did not especially select the one from which I want to quote. The first page of this register has, in one column, a number of families with the same name — Noel J. McGrann, Noel J. McGrann; Thomas Devlin, Thomas Devlin; Desmond McCleary, Desmond McCleary. On the next page there is John McGurgan, John McGurgan; Michael O'Hagan, Michael O'Hagan; Thomas O'Connor, Thomas O'Connor; John McKeown, John McKeown; Maureen McKeever, Maureen McKeever.

If some of those people were nursing, at university or too sick to vote, there is nothing to prevent someone using their documentation. My son is also James H. McCusker. I presume that he could use my card as identification. The use of these documents could assist benign personation —where one member of a family felt it obligatory to cast a vote for another member of a family.

The production of marriage lines has already been mentioned. There is something repugnant about asking a woman to produce her marriage lines when she votes. It is asking too much. I felt so strongly about that that I contacted the Equal Opportunities Commission in Northern Ireland. I might have misled it a little as I thought that a woman had to produce both her medical card and her marriage lines. I am glad to know that that is not the case. If my original understanding had been right, the Equal Opportunities Commission said that it would serve an injunction on the Government because a woman should not have to produce her marriage lines.

I still have not been given a satisfactory explanation as to why a woman should be asked to produce her marriage lines. The Equal Opportunities Commission said that she is the same person as she was before her marriage, and can claim her previous name even after her marriage.

I hope that I have managed to convince hon. Members that the Bill is dangerous. Although it may prevent some abuse, it will damage the electoral voting prospects of many others—perhaps more than those affected by vote-stealing.

I hope that no one will say that I am giving the Provisional Sinn Fein ideas. The Bill gives our enemies a potent weapon for disruption. Two hon. Members have described what will happen because of the delay in the usual processes. If Sinn Fein cannot steal someone's vote, it will be as good to prevent someone from voting for another party. I think that what I am about to describe is not beyond the bounds of possibility. Let us assume that because of the additional measures the number of booths would have to be doubled, as would the number of people employed — although £50,000 does not leave a great deal of scope for that.

Let us suppose that there are 50 dedicated Sinn Fein supporters in one area who all join together on the morning of an election and swap their medical cards, 25 for 25. Let us suppose also that the 50 go to the polling station and cast 50 votes. The consequence of that will be that 25 will personate the other 25. There will be no reason why they should be challenged at the time of voting. They will be able to return their medical cards to one another outside the polling station. There will be legitimate delays, and at about half-past six, seven o'clock or half-past seven in the evening a series of Provisional Sinn Fein supporters will enter the polling station. They will be in possession of their own medical cards or DHSS booklets, for example. Each one will set down his document and say, "That is me." The presiding officer will say, "I am sorry, but your vote has already been cast."

The House will be able to imagine how long it would take in those circumstances to deal with their synthetic indignation and protests. They would produce other evidence to prove that they are who they say they are as stated on the medical cards. They would put the presiding officer to every possible difficulty in invoking the tendered ballot paper procedure. They would tie up the voting machine to such an extent that hundreds could be prevented from voting.

I have been in polling stations in Northern Ireland where the queue has stretched out into the street. Between 9 and 10 o'clock the queue can be as long as 50 or 60. Many of the potential voters are probably already sick of what they understand democracy to be in Northern Ireland, and as it is shown to be in the poll results to which I have referred. Party workers and others will have encouraged them to produce their driving licence or passport, if they are lucky enough to have one, and they will be stuck in a long queue. By 9 or 10 o'clock in the evening many of them will have turned back in any event. We are giving another weapon to the Sinn Fein.

I hope that I shall not be criticised for putting ideas into the heads of Sinn Fein supporters. Let it be understood that they are as capable of exploiting any advantage that we give them as any other group. How can these potential dangers be avoided? We are dealing with Sinn Fein and the Bill has been introduced because of its abuses and threats to legitimate political parties.

Sinn Fein has chosen to exploit the democratic process and perhaps we should consider dealing with Sinn Fein. It could be proscribed if the Government had the courage to take that action. If the Government do not want to do that, they should consider one of the recommendations that is to be found in the Baker report. It is said that Sinn Fein could maintain its legitimacy as a political party but be prevented from fighting an election while it is pledged to support violence. If the Secretary of State has not read that section of the Baker report, I hope that he will address himself to it. If Sinn Fein was put in that position it would not be able to steal votes and there would be no incentive for it to do so.

Perhaps the only other logical alternative is to issue identity cards. My right hon. Friend the Member for South Down has not fully satisfied himself how identity cards can be made foolproof. I do not think any of us have done so. If national insurance numbers were placed on identity cards and on the electoral registers which presiding officers have, that might provide a suitable cross-check. We have considered also some of the suggestions that have been made by the hon. Member for Foyle.

We can turn what is now a victory for Sinn Fein into a defeat if we handle the issue in the proper way. The fact that the Bill has been introduced is a victory for Sinn Fein. The Diplock courts are a victory for Sinn Fein and so are the informer trials. Every infringement of my liberty and the liberty of decent people in Northern Ireland is a victory for Sinn Fein.

If we give a Bill a Second Reading that will prevent ordinary decent people from exercising their franchise, because they do not have the required documents, for example, we shall give Sinn Fein another victory. Surely we should try to deny it that victory. The way to do that would be to accept the recommendation of the Baker report or produce identity cards. The issuing of identity cards may not be favoured in other parts of the United Kingdom but account should be taken of what we in Northern Ireland have had to live with over the past 15 years. Identity cards could preserve the democratic process and assist in overcoming the other abuses involving the social security system. Even better, they could help in the battle against terrorism.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): It is not necessary for the representative of an English constituency to explain his intervention in a debate on Northern Ireland. The citizens of the Province are the citizens of the same kingdom as I am. Their problems are my problems and the problems of us all and we must all consider them sympathetically and try to be helpful. The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) was right when he said that the Bill concerns us all.

It has often been said that democracy is our strength and our bulwark. The hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) made a similar observation. We use these idioms—strengths and bulwarks—as though democracy were immovable and had deep and strong foundations. In fact, the idioms are somewhat deceptive. In many senses democracy is frail. Indeed, it is in need of positive and vigorous protection. It is frail when menaces are used, and the citizens of Northern Ireland understand menaces and intimidation. Democracy is frail when corruption is abroad. It is frail when someone steals another person's vote.

I took note of the words of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights:

"The right to vote is the cornerstone of democracy."

Again, that is the granite idiom. We know what the author meant, but democracy is something more movable than a cornerstone. The chief electoral registration officer for Northern Ireland has spoken of a

"perception of a high level of abuse."

We would probably have to take some steps to put things right and to provide reassurance even if it were only a perception, but it is more than that, and in paragraph 30 the commission refers to as one of the first importance. It is more than a perception, but even the perception of abuse is readily illustrated by the fact that over 900, for sure, cast pink votes in Northern Ireland in the general election. Those are the 900 who were prepared in the presence of others to record their indignation at having lost their votes. Some, having learnt that they had lost their votes, would have been annoyed but would have withdrawn. Those people might have been timid or they might have made a prudent calculation that the odds in their community were against them and that they were not looking for trouble.

"the need to reassure the electorate of confidence in their democratic institutions"

There are other abuses, but at present I am speaking only of the stealing of votes. The measurement of 900 is the minimum for one of the abuses.

We have learnt that the documents are still available for further consideration, and that the list of categories may be changed in some way. A current driving licence has limited usefulness. Not all citizens possess a driving licence. It is possible to lose a licence because some traffic offence was committed. Paradoxically, a person who commits a traffic offence may hazard his vote as well. Remarks have been made about using a passport or pension book, but not everyone has one.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) dealt extensively with medical cards. Before I heard what the hon. Gentleman said, I was tempted to suggest that a photograph should be attached to the medical card. The medical card would say nothing about the citizen's politics or allegiance. A passport refers to allegiance, but a medical card gives away nothing about allegiance. A medical card with an attached photograph might provide an answer. We would have to consider updating the photograph, lest that politician's vanity of addressing himself by an old photograph creeps into the system.

I am less puzzled than other Members about the use of the marriage certificate. There comes a time—weeks or months—for every woman when the name by which she knows herself differs from the name on the electoral roll. Since she wishes to call herself by her new name in her new state, her marriage lines provide the reconciliation of what she thinks she is called and what the electoral register says. I should not like to look for anything discriminatory in this issue. The marriage certificate does not cause a problem, and indeed, is one of the more helpful inclusions in the list.

Mr. William Ross: What about a woman who does not have marriage lines?

Mr. Taylor: Presumably, a common law wife has a name by which she is usually known, which would be the name that would appear on the electoral register. She would have fewer problems than the woman who had recently married — [Interruption.] I cannot take the intervention of the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) from a sedentary position.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Does the hon. Member for Solihull agree with me that the certificate of marriage signed by the officiating officer, as with the regular certificate used for all other purposes in Northern Ireland, should be used rather than the certificate issued by the Registrar-General of Northern Ireland?

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman made that point forcefully when he addressed the Chamber. I concede that I understand the problem without having an answer readily at my grasp. I am not completely au fait with the rules for the registration of marriage in Northern Ireland. In fairness to the hon. Gentleman, I must say that at first blush I found his argument convincing.

I have been tempted to ask, to conclude my contribution to the discussion about lists, why the birth certificate was not among the candidate documents. There is a case for including it in the list. The birth certificate is one of the most fundamental documents for identification.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): One can obtain a copy of the hon. Gentleman's birth certificate at any time on payment of a modest fee.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman may have already studied the objection. His findings may provide a complete objection to my suggestion. I believe that the Government Front Bench agrees that the debate about the list is far from its conclusion. No doubt a number of suggestions will be made.

Since this is a Second Reading debate, I shall trespass and offer the opinion that another democratic entity that needs our encouragement is the Northern Ireland Assembly. Many of us in Britain would like that Assembly to prosper, acquire competence and functions and develop regular questioning of Northern Ireland Ministers. My sentiments about personation are directed as much to elections to that Assembly as to general elections in Northern Ireland and elections to the European Parliament.

As one of the two John Taylors in the House, I am well aware of some of the consequences of mistaken identity.

If I lack my namesake's native depth of knowledge of Northern Ireland experience, I certainly do not lack his correspondence. It takes me only a few lines of reading to realise apologetically that the correspondence is not for me. There are certainly colourful letters. Sometimes letters come from Philadelphia—a remarkable address for mail for the hon. Member for Solihull. As an Englishman called John Taylor, I understand the problem caused by an electoral roll, which was produced by the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker), which shows the commonality of names in Northern Ireland communities.

I hope that I do not lack a proper awareness of the fact that, if cheating and malpractice interfere with democratic elections in some parts of our country, the Government must act to put things right. The House should support the Government in doing so. A difference of philosophy has been shown in this debate. There are those hon. Members like myself and the hon. Member for Upper Bann—I cannot claim to speak for the hon. Gentleman—who would prefer some improvements to be made now. There are others who would like the matter to be treated once and for all. As an Englishman considering Northern Ireland affairs, perhaps I do not fully understand Northern Ireland politics. I readily concede that this is almost certainly because I have not had the advantage of living in the Province all my life; I have only been a visitor. Sometimes Northern Ireland politics seem to be rather negative.

I see an identified, obvious and undesirable abuse that we should put right. The Government are bringing forward the beginnings of a means to improve the position. The solution may not be absolute—indeed, it does not go as far as identity cards would—or sufficiently constitutionally elegant to satisfy some hon. Members. The hon. Member for Upper Bann thought that the measure would deter some personation, and I suspect that it will. The legislation will be good if it does so. We should note how the measure goes. It will be splendid if it is successful. If a further case for identity cards emerges, the Government and their supporters will have been shown to have been too optimistic, and the Government will be obliged to take further action. I shall be one of the first to ask the Government to take that further action. Having listened to this debate—I shall listen to the other contributions—I am disposed at this stage, on the balance of the argument, to support the Government.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): I was somewhat taken aback when the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) wished the Secretary of State well in his new post. I also, of course, wish him well in his new post, but having seen so much of him so often over the past few weeks I had forgotten that he was a new boy. He can no longer be regarded as such. He has had little comfort during the debate. He need not expect any from me, because the net effect of the Bill, were it to be an Act today and were today to be polling day, would be that I should not be entitled to vote despite the fact that the notes on clauses presented to those hon. Members who sought a copy from the Vote Office say that the Bill does not directly bear on the franchise. It does. If it denies me my vote, it bears upon the franchise. Later I shall tell the Secretary of State how it denies me my vote.

Personation should be dealt with. Here I agree with almost every right hon. Member who has spoken. There is too much personation in Northern Ireland. I do not take the luxury of dividing it into two sections — the personation of those who are dead and those who could not go out to vote, and the personation of the votes of those who would have voted had it not been that their vote was stolen. One category is as wrong as the other. I would make no excuse for either. Let every party in the House, whether it be Conservative, Labour or any Northern Ireland party, admit that few of us could say with hand on heart that we know of no case of a vote cast for our parties in that manner. I am sure that every one of us knows that it has happened on one or more occasions, no matter how much we may disapprove of it.

However, we must recognise that the problem of personation is not unique or peculiar to Northern Ireland. It occurs elsewhere in the United Kingdom. I recall many conversations with hon. Members with constituencies on the mainland—as we term it—who have told me of instances of personation in their constituencies. The fact that the Bill is unique and peculiar to Northern Ireland shows that the Government have deemed that there is an acceptable level of personation. We might also say that they have deemed that there is an acceptable level of some other activities. It is all right to have some personation in parts of the United Kingdom, but when it reaches a certain level we must take action.

I might argue, as the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) did, that there are many constituencies within Northern Ireland where there is a low rate of personation. I am glad to say that my constituency is one of them. I believe that no more than a handful of the pink voting papers were issued. Whether it was right to do it or not, the Secretary of State will probably find that most, if not all, of those pink papers were given because the presiding officer had in front of him a voter who went to the polling station and found that his name was not on the electoral list. He was given a pink slip to quieten him down because he was kicking up such a din in the polling station. He thought therefore that he had voted. It may not have been proper for the presiding officer to do that, but I think that it probably happened in many constituencies to get the man out through the door.

I understand the dilemma of those hon. Members who face personation on a wide scale. It is that category that needs action. Personation can affect the result of elections in Northern Ireland. The hon. Member for Upper Bann said—and I agree with him—that no case could be cited of a parliamentary election being won because of personation. As the hon. Member who in 1979 had perhaps the narrowest margin of victory in Northern Ireland's electoral history—I was elected by 64 votes—I am glad to hear him say that. At least it kept me clear, but, having a narrow voting margin of 64 for election to the House, I recognise that there are other constituencies where an election could be won or lost by votes stolen or personated in some other way.

I think of the electoral area represented by my colleague, the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea). He has a majority of 74 votes over, yes, Sinn Fein, the very people whom we would expect the Bill to deal with. Plainly in 1983, when the election to the House took place, Sinn Fein was working hard at personating in Mid-Ulster. It was only 75 votes off winning the election. I suggest that it will work all the harder at the next Westminster election to see whether it can obtain those extra votes. Let us not think that it is impossible for an election to be swayed by the additional votes cast by those who are using personation.

There are several other constituencies where the result could be tight at the next election. Newry and Armagh would be one and Fermanagh and South Tyrone would be another. Who knows what the division in Belfast, West might cause? Those constituencies might be swung by personation. Elections other than those to this House frequently take place in Northern Ireland but under a voting system different from that used in the rest of the United Kingdom — proportional representation. I can recall an election in the south-west Belfast area where a handful of votes decided that Sinn Fein was elected. In proportional representation elections it is all the more important that restrictions are applied to ensure that the electoral system is not abused.

I have every sympathy with those who protest that Sinn Fein, and perhaps some other individuals, used this illegal activity. I want, as they do, to find a mechanism to stop that abuse.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that you would not suggest that the reason why personation may pertain more in Northern Ireland than anywhere else in the United Kingdom is that there are more dishonest people in Northern Ireland than anywhere else in the United Kingdom. My experience on the mainland suggests that there is probably little difference. However, if there is, honesty bears in favour of the people of Northern Ireland. I am receiving some strange looks, so perhaps I had better clarify that remark. My experience of the mainland extends outside the House; I am not reflecting upon the integrity of any hon. Member, but that suggestion does not explain the mass personation in Northern Ireland constituencies.

I, and I am sure other Northern Ireland Members, might like to suggest that one of the reasons is that we are such colourful, likeable and charismatic characters that people are not satisfied with voting for us once; they favour us so greatly that they must vote for us many times. That may not be all of the truth. The reason may be that politics in Northern Ireland are taken a great deal more seriously than they are in other parts of the United Kingdom. That is why what the hon. Member for Upper Bann described as the more acceptable form of personation takes place—there is great loyalty to the individual and to the party which causes people to blind themselves to what is right in voting practice and to do that which they should not.

The second category of personation—vote stealing—is indulged in by those people who wish not to use the electoral system but to abuse it. After all, if people are prepared to try to gain victory by shooting others, it will cause them little thought if they try to gain victory by personation. That is a major problem in many areas of Northern Ireland.

I have some difficulty in persuading myself that it is right to introduce such a Bill as this solely for Northern Ireland. The franchise in Northern Ireland is exercised through different systems of voting in different elections. It can be argued that any election is unique to Northern Ireland; it is a Northern Ireland-only election. The system that is adopted might be different from that operating elsewhere in the United Kingdom. All those elected to the body concerned should be elected in exactly the same manner. However, when people in constituencies in this part of the United Kingdom are allowed to vote without giving any identification, but voters in Northern Ireland are treated in a different way, when it is the same body, I find some difficulty in squaring that with the parity that should exist in electoral law throughout the United Kingdom.

I would even be prepared to thole all that, to use an Ulster expression, if I thought that the mechanism to be employed would work. I refer to the Secretary of State's attempt to disfranchise me in Northern Ireland. I said at the beginning of my speech that if the Bill were an Act, and if it had been polling day, I would not be entitled to vote. If the notes on clauses were the guidelines for the presiding officer, under the Act he would be acting outside the law if he recognised me as Peter Robinson and gave me a ballot paper. The presiding officer could give me a ballot paper only if I produced one of the items on the list, such as a medical card. I have one—I got it out last night. I have moved house five times since I lived at the address on the medical card. If I went to the polling station and asked for my ballot paper on producing my medical card, the presiding officer would see that it did not bear the same address as that on the electoral register, and he would not be entitled to do anything other than refuse me my ballot paper.

However, I have a driving licence. It has a photograph on it that would show the presiding officer that I am Peter Robinson. However, again the problem is that I have moved house in the past few weeks. The address on my driving licence is not the same as the address on the electoral register because the register has continuous registration. I do not want to hand in my driving licence until the period for the fee that I have paid——

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that that is not the best example to quote, because he is acting illegally? He is breaking the law if he does not say that he has changed his address.

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Gentleman obviously is not——

Mr. Brown: I am talking about a driving licence for Great Britain.

Mr. Robinson: The question is whether I use my driving licence. I do not because I do not drive. I have a driving licence, can drive, but do not. Therefore, I do not need to change the address on my driving licence.

Therefore, again, the presiding officer would not be able to give me a ballot paper although he recognised me and would be prepared to give one to me. I also have a passport, and it does not have an address, but I have the same problem as the hon. Member for Upper Bann. In Northern Ireland, it is common that the name of the son is the same as the name of the father, with a middle name put in. The hon. Member for Upper Bann said that his medical certificate stated that his name was "James H. McCusker". My name is David Peter Robinson. There was some confusion around my house when the name David was called when we had to do the dishes, and nobody got up. So I became known as Peter. For electoral purposes, I am known as Peter Robinson, but my passport says David Robinson. Therefore, if I produce my passport to the presiding officer, no doubt he will say that I am not entitled to a ballot paper, and that he is not allowed to give it to me because there is some doubt in his mind about whether I am entitled to vote when the electoral register says Peter Robinson.

Perhaps that is a unique case, but anyone who has moved house and not changed his documents but whose address has been changed through continuous registration, will be disfranchised unless he can meet the criteria by some means of identification that does not bear an address. That can be only the passport, and nobody knows how many passports are issued to Northern Ireland citizens.

It is strange for the Government to suggest that suitable identification would consist of a document with anything less on it than the name, address, photograph and signature of the individual. Unless the document has all four details, the vote could be given to the wrong person. I can draw only one conclusion from that. There is not one document in the list in the notes on clauses that falls into that category, yet I should have thought that it was essential to have each of those four, and certainly three—the name, address and photograph of the individual—to ensure that the person getting the ballot paper was the person whose name was on the electoral register.

However, the Secretary of State seems unwilling to allow a document to be produced that would give every elector the right to have such identification. It could be done. I would even accept it if it were only for Northern Ireland, although I would prefer it if it were for the whole of the United Kingdom. What is the Secretary of State's excuse for not being prepared to have separate identification for elections? It is that some people may not want it. I wonder who they would be. They would be the very people voting once, twice, three times and perhaps a lot more. Those are the only people I can think of who would refuse to have such identification at elections. I think, as the Secretary of State does, that some politicians in Northern Ireland, if not the United Kingdom, might want it to be used for other purposes such as security.

If it is to be a worthwhile identification, it must have all four ingredients that I mentioned. In the past few years presiding officers have laboured under severe difficulties. I know of several who must know of individuals who come in more than once to vote. They know it but are afraid to do anything about it. Will they do something about it if the person comes in and presents a fake form of identification? Will that make them have the courage to take action? I doubt it. If the Secretary of State turns his back on all of us who say, "Think again about a proper means of ensuring that personation is reduced," let him at least find some way of ensuring that people such as those in the security forces can participate in checking the identification. They would be less likely to be in fear of taking action against those who personate. There might be considerable difficulties in involving the security forces, but unless we have that involvement there will still be the possibility that either clerks or presiding officers will find it difficult—they might live in the areas from which those men come — to take the action that the law requires.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann suggested that more power should perhaps be given to the presiding officer to accept the evidence of his eyes as much as the documentation before him. That sounds like common sense, but it can be done only if there is security protection for the individual who has to judge whether the would-be voter is entitled to vote. Otherwise, the officer might be persuaded by matters other than reason and logic to hand over a ballot paper.

On the subject of delays, I wonder how many polling stations in Northern Ireland have been visited by the Secretary of State, other Ministers or the people who drafted the legislation. In an election lasting 12 hours, from 8 am to 8 pm, especially the first under this legislation, about one third of the people coming to vote will probably have to come to the polling station twice before they can register their votes. There will be delays involved in searching for the documentation and checking identification. The clerk may wish to bring the presiding officer in for consultation. Moreover, under PR there would be a number of names on the ballot paper. Given the queues that already exist on such occasions, will everyone who wishes be able to vote? I doubt very much whether the Secretary of State could achieve that and remain within the £50,000 financial consequences identified in the explanatory memorandum because unless there are more polling stations with more staff the existing time scale will not be sufficient.

One type of document suggested for indentification purposes is a book for payment of certain allowances. I have had great difficulty in persuading many of my constituents to claim the benefits to which they are entitled. They have been very embarrassed at doing so and I very much doubt whether they would be prepared to produce their payment books to show the presiding officer or clerk when neighbours may be standing behind them in the queue.

All in all, I believe that the effectiveness of the Bill would be extremely low, although the welcome increases in penalties for impersonation might assist in reducing the number of people prepared to indulge in the practice. I suspect, however, that many IRA voters — I do not distinguish between them and Sinn Fein—would not be deterred by a six-month sentence or the kind of fine suggested in the notes on clauses.

Rev. Martin Smyth: How would the penalties be implemented if the person involved withdrew his claim when challenged?

Mr. Robinson: The constables will no doubt have power to stop people withdrawing. The presiding officer, however, may wish to give the person a second chance, as the notes on clauses magnanimously provide—"If at first you don't succeed, try, try again!" If the presiding officer is prepared to let the person have another go and wishes to send him off to fetch some appropriate documents while the constable wishes to restrain that person, one wonders what the result will be. Perhaps time will tell.

Although the Bill will undoubtedly make impersonation more difficult, it will make things equally difficult for the genuine voter whom we wish to encourage to exercise his or her franchise. We need legislation that will not penalise those who are entitled to exercise the franchise and wish to do so but will catch those attempting to exercise someone else's franchise. I believe in the principle of one man, one vote in this case. Funnily enough, however, those who a few years ago were on the streets demanding just that now seek half a dozen or more. I have pleasure in supporting the amendment.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): The hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor), who has now left, said that there was a difference of philosophy in the debate. I believe that he was wrong. It is not a difference of philosophy. It is a difference of perception between those who represent constituencies in Great Britain and have no knowledge of personation in Ireland, whether in Northern Ireland or in the Republic, and those of us who live in Northern Ireland and have had to deal with the problem on the doorstep. It is that difference of perception, understanding and experience that sets us apart from the Government on this. I hope that in the light of this debate the Government will take the Bill away and think the whole matter through, which they apparently have not done so far. Certainly that is the impression that Northern Ireland Members received when listening to the Secretary of State.

When I first went into politics I cut my teeth keeping electoral registers right, on local elections and on being a party political organiser in my area. That was on an entirely voluntary basis but it involved taking a great deal of interest in the whole process of running elections and ensuring that my numerous political enemies did not personate. I therefore speak as one with far greater experience of this matter than most other Members because the area in which I lived then and still live now is dominated by Republicans and we have always suspected considerable personation. We thus had not only to take cognizance of that possibility but to take steps to prevent it happening, which I believe in large measure we did.

We should be clear about the reasons for the Bill. It is to stop the electoral advance of Sinn Fein. But for that perceived electoral advance, the Bill would not have been introduced and this debate would not be taking place. It is also, as a side issue, to save the bacon of the SDLP from the electoral advance of Sinn Fein.

We have heard the myth of the 20,000 impersonated votes. A number of hon. Members have touched on this but I wish to go into it again. Twenty thousand impersonated votes is 20 per cent., or one in five, of the votes cast for Sinn Fein. That is a very high percentage. I think that it would have been impossible for that number of votes to be personated, especially as the alleged personations were not spread evenly over the Province; they took place in relatively small areas and among relatively small sections of the total population.

Perhaps we should look again at the constituencies involved. One that has been mentioned several times is the constituency of Foyle, which is in my part of the world. Personation in the Foyle did not cover the whole of Foyle, but only Creggan, the Bogside, Cornhill and Shantallow—the west bank of the Foyle. We are asked to believe that the Social Democratic and Labour party is so inefficient in that area as to allow mass personation to take place, and yet the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), who is the leader of that party, has told us how effective his party members were on that morning, when they turned away 50 people out of every 700.

What is the effect in the polling stations of the turning away of attempted personators? They go out and tell their friends that the game is not worth the candle because they are being challenged. There is a perception on the part of the lawbreaker about whether he will get away with it.

I do not believe that 20,000 personated votes were cast for Sinn Fein. It is a marvellous story to tell in an effort to downgrade the achievement of Sinn Fein, but I do not believe that it is true.

The hon. Member for Foyle referred to the militaristic organisation of the personation. Of course it was militaristic. That is how Sinn Fein and the IRA organise themselves. There is a carefully organised and co-ordinated campaign which can be very difficult to stop —but, none the less, it can be stopped.

What are the essentials for stopping personation? The first essential is an accurate electoral register. Despite all the nice things which are said about the electoral register today and the glowing reports put out each year by the chief electoral registration officer, I do not believe that the electoral register in Northern Ireland is one iota more satisfactory or accurate than it was before the present electoral registration system was set up.

In the old days, the electoral registration system worked through local officials — usually members of local government such as county officials—and through the intense activity of the political parties. Every political party did a certain amount of electoral registration work. When one lives and works in the places in Northern Ireland where I and some of my most energetic and assiduous colleagues have lived and worked, one makes blooming sure that the register is right. We do it street by street, name by name and house by house. We do it well, because we know the people there. The population is not so large that we are incapable of identifying the vast majority of the people. What Sinn Fein and the IRA fear more than anything else is the knowledge of the community in which they operate being in the hands of their foes. The 90 or 100 Protestant households in the Creggan estate left that estate within a few weeks of the explosion of trouble in 1969. The resulting absence of local knowledge is the reason why, ever since that time, it has been difficult for those of us engaged in that work—and my own party does much of the work for the Unionist community — to operate in that area.

I used to have my network of men and women who were not known as party workers. I visited them two or three times a year with a register in my hand and asked them to tell me which of their neighbours had died and which had left, and we were able to correct the register. Political parties in Great Britain probably do not go to those lengths. Perhaps they do not have the incentive that party workers in Northern Ireland have always had and still have. The whole concept of compiling an accurate register is difficult in a community which is solidly Roman Catholic or Protestant because, in general terms, the opposing factions are not willing or able to operate efficiently in such areas. However, there are ways in which one can compile a fairly accurate register. Most of Northern Ireland is a mixed community in which it is possible for both sections of the community to operate, and they do it assiduously and well.

In the city of Londonderry, there was at one time an organisation known as the Catholic Registration Society. It was run, virtually, by the Roman Catholic Church. The society corrected the registers with the aid of paid staff and handed them over to the nationalist party as soon as an election was called. That organisation has disappeared, and I do not believe that the present system gives us a register which is as accurate.

There was a tremendous amount of co-operation between all the political parties in those days in order to arrive at an accurate register. There is still co-operation in many parts of the Province. No party benefits, especially at present, from the appearance on the register of numbers of people who do not exist. It is in the interests of all parties to have a register which is as accurate as possible.

Not all my hon. Friends agree with me, but I believe that one of the most serious mistakes of recent years in the compilation of electoral registers is the concept of permanent registration. It is almost impossible for the political parties, which do an enormous amount of the work, to keep up with the constant checking that is necessary. They do not have a paid staff. The work is done on a voluntary basis, and it is as if 15 September arrived every month. It is very difficult indeed.

There is only one really good way to stop personation at polling stations, and that is to put people there who know their neighbours. In most parts of Northern Ireland, there are personation agents or representatives in the polling station who make sure that personation does not take place. The odd case may slip through—cases such as my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) has described—but it is a minor problem, and always has been. In a mixed community, massive personation is frankly impossible, as anyone who has worked in the field knows. The Social Democratic and Labour party apparently had difficulty on the west bank of the Foyle in Londonderry but the leader of that party has told us that the party was able, in large measure, to put a stopper on the problem. Despite the early success of Sinn Fein and all its efforts, I believe that Sinn Fein did not do quite as well as it had expected out of personation. Of course there was much more personation than usual, but it would be wrong to believe that one vote in every two or three cast for Sinn Fein in that relatively small area was personated, which would have had to be the case if Sinn Fein was to gain 20,000 votes over the whole country. We must forget about the majority of the country and bring those 20,000 people to the areas where Sinn Fein was well organised and could do it on a fairly large scale. I would have accepted a figure of 5,000, or possibly even 10,000, but 20,000 is not possible. It can only be done in the areas in which Sinn Fein works freely.

Has any hon. Member thought about the size of the operation that would be necessary if a political body, or even a militaristic body like Sinn Fein, were to get 20,000 votes from the 600,000 vote cast? It would have to be a bigger operation than the entire election campaign. It could not be done, and it was not done.

The Bill was written by people who believe that they know about personation and how it is carried out, but they do not know. They do not know because they have not been down in the gutter fighting for their political lives against the personators. They do not know what it is about. They have listened to the stories, the myths and the nonsense that has been talked, but they have never been in a polling station trying to stop personation and they have never organised a political party to try to stop it. Only those who have been in the gutter fighting those people know how difficult it can be made for them.

Hon. Members have not yet mentioned the fact that there will be a shift of responsibility from the political parties to the presiding officers to ensure that such evils do not occur. I am not against a presiding officer's powers being increased, but generally speaking the most effective presiding officer is a teacher from the school in which the polling station is set up. During the past two elections in Northern Ireland there seemed to be a tendency to move many presiding officers from the school where they taught and from the communities where they knew electors. That was wrong. It would be much better to keep those people on home ground where they know the electorate; that of itself is an inhibiting factor to the personating groups.

We should try to use local people as much as possible, but we will put the brakes on personation only if the community and the political parties are prepared to challenge their enemies and to defeat them. It is not easy, but who said that staying free was easy? Who said that democracy was obtained easily? I can tell the House that when democracy is attacked, it is not easily retained. We have to fight for it and get down into the gutter where those people live and stop them. We must do it ourselves, because no one else will do it for us. The political parties of Ulster, and no one else, will stop personation. We can be helped, but the only aids that would work are those that were described earlier by my right hon. and hon. Friends and by the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson).

Personation occurs mainly in constituencies where the outcome of an election is in doubt. Who would bother with personation in a constituency such as Antrim, South or in several other constituencies when they know that the majorities are so massive that my hon. Friends would win no matter what? The only places where they try are those where there is doubt. That is where we must have positive identification that ties the individual to the name on the electoral register. It is daft to say to presiding officers, "We know that you know three quarters or 90 per cent. of the people who come through the polling station, but you cannot give them ballot papers if they do not have the specified documents." The plain truth is that the presiding officer of the clerk knows Willie Ross when he walks through the door of Dungivan school. Would he not look stupid refusing to give me a ballot paper, if I said, "I am sorry, but I cannot show you my driving licence"? Indeed, I could not at the moment, because I lost it three weeks ago and I must apply for another. My hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann had a 20-year-old medical card. He is lucky. I have not seen my medical card for more than 20 years, and although I have not moved house, I do not know where it is.

We should be honest about the fact that the Bill is designed to defeat Sinn Fein. We want to defeat the front men for the gun carriers and the murderers. I agree with that, but the Bill will not defeat them. As my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann said, the Sinn Fein vote has increased and is always there. The Secretary of State might be interested to know the results of general elections in Northern Ireland during the past 30 years. In 1950, two Sinn Fein candidates got 23,000 votes. In 1955, when Sinn Fein was the only nationalist party standing, it got 152,000 votes for 12 candidates. In 1959, after the IRA had started the 1956-61 murder campaign, 12 Sinn Fein candidates got 63,000 votes. In 1968, 14 candidates received 102,000 votes.

In Northern Ireland, there has always been a potential Sinn Fein vote of between 70,000 and 120,000. The figure varies depending on the circumstances or the time, but it has not changed much during the past 30 or 40 years, and there is no reason to believe that it will change. It grows and diminishes, but it does not do so because actual Sinn Fein support grows or diminishes; it does so because of the circumstances, the other candidates, and the perception of the electorate as to which candidate of their general tribe is the more likely to win.

Another way of defeating Sinn Fein, which should be put into effect, whether or not identity cards are introduced, is to get rid of proportional representation. The system has allowed extremists to say to the population, "Vote for me first, but in case I do not do well you should go down the line and make sure that the person with the views closest to mine wins." Sinn Fein has been allowed to exploit to the maximum its latent support in the community by this means.

If we return to the first-past-the-post system, elections will be a bit of a mess at first, but less of a mess thereafter. If we are to get rid of Sinn Fein, let us start squeezing them where it hurts—let us squeeze the people who vote for them and let us make them make the choice. At the end of the day, the people in the community will group round their natural centre and if that is to the right of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), that is a matter of small concern to me. On the other hand, his persuasive powers are such that he might still represent the majority view of his party. If the Government are intent on beating Sinn Fein into the earth, as they say they are, they should take the steps that will start doing that.

The Bill has been introduced with the most astonishing haste and is being shoved through the House far too quickly, before either the Secretary of State or the House has had time to think the thing through to see whether it will have the desired effect. It is a case of, "Let us do something—it does not matter what, but we must be seen to do something." That is worse than doing nothing at all, because things that do not succeed in doing good can succeed in doing harm. We have seen that time and again.

For heaven's sake, let us stand back look at the problem and think again. Will the Secretary of State not be too dogmatic, because what is at stake is the democratic process in Northern Ireland? At the end of the day, the welfare of the people of Northern Ireland depends on him. Will he stand back and spend his weekend reading what has been said by hon. Members today and then think again and change his mind?

I am not saying this in any party political sense. What I am saying springs from a deep and enduring understanding of the way of life in Ulster, of the activities of those who personate and the desires and the efforts of Sinn Fein to destroy democracy. I want to see the would-be destroyers destroyed, rather than being rendered victors through a mistaken, misguided effort in this place.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): I apologise for being absent for part of the debate. There have been some elections in another part of the Palace of Westminster, in which personation is completely impossible.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) and the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) both gracefully complimented my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and welcomed him to his responsibilities. My right hon. Friend's hon. Friends would not wish to be backward in also wishing him well, and we shall help him as best we may.

There is general consent for the purpose of the Bill. The House wants personation stopped wherever it may appear, in elections in any part of the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) made an impressive speech and implied that this is really a Bill to stop Sinn Fein, rather than personation. The hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) is not here, although he has spoken. I make no complaint about his absence, but I thought that he was the main, if not the only, begetter of this legislation. His party has been the most vociferous in demanding action.

The Irish News of 2 November reported that Mr. Joe Hendron, the SDLP Assembly Member for West Belfast said:

"The many thousands of people who have had their votes stolen in recent elections will be delighted at the good news"—of the Bill—

"as also will the hundreds of SDLP personation agents who have been in the frontline attempting to stop personation. The SDLP now looks forward to fair elections and the verdict of the people in 1985."

The House should be glad to respond to the desire of constitutional nationalists, and also of other democratic parties, to be able to compete on fair terms for the votes of the electorate. It is true that there are now those in the political arena who are concerned neither for democratic process nor for democracy. Provisional Sinn Fein is determined—this is the burden of the SDLP complaint—to replace constitutional nationalism by revolutionary republicanism, not just in the Six Counties but in the 26 counties. The not honourable but absent Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) called those 26 counties a potato republic.

In Northern Ireland, the Provisional Sinn Fein boasts of pursuing its aim and imposing its will by a dual policy of blood and ballot: the Armalite in one hand and in the other a ballot paper—one's own, or somebody else's, be he dead or alive. The Provisional Sinn Fein is an elitist conspiracy against parliamentary government and representative democracy, so one should not be surprised if the Provisional Sinn Fein, with its increasing efficiency and organisation, has elevated the old practice of personation to a higher plane of organised malpractice.

However, we must not think of it just in terms of the grievances of the SDLP. Concern is felt by all constitutional parties and honest citizens who wish to protect the probity of the electoral system. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred to the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights and some hon. Friends and I myself met its chairman, Mr. James O'Hara, only the other day. The commission has recommended a measure on the lines of this Bill. In its report, dated 1 October, in paragraph 27 I find these words:

"At the Northern Ireland Assembly election, 26 persons were arrested (mostly in the Fermanagh and South Tyrone and the Belfast North and Belfast West constituencies) for the alleged offence of personation and 762 tendered ballot papers were issued (mostly in the Belfast North and Belfast West constituencies). The Commission understand that 149 persons were arrested on polling day of the last general election and of these 108 were subsequently charged. The number of tendered ballot papers issued was 949, more than half of which were in the constituencies of Foyle and Belfast West."

The Secretary of State has said that about 20 to 25 per cent. of the Sinn Fein's vote can be accounted for in terms of malpractice.

Mr. Beggs: We have heard the last comment several times. Is it not conceivable that, so that the SDLP can disguise that it has done so badly and that its former supporters were really Sinn Fein supporters, it has made the excuse that the votes were lost by personation?

Sir John Biggs-Davison: I was merely quoting to the House the figure which I heard the Secretary of State give us, that there was this very high proportion of fraudulent votes cast for provisional Sinn Fein.

We heard the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross). We have now heard the intervention from the hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs). It would be helpful to the House if we could have some further comment from my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott) if he seeks to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

This is the Elections (Northern Ireland) Bill. The Gracious Speech foreshadowed and the Secretary of State mentioned today a Representation of the People Bill. That will be a United Kingdom measure. The question in my mind is why the provisions in this Bill could not have been included in the Representation of the People Bill ahead of us.

It is not as though personation is confined to Northern Ireland. The hon. Member for Londonderry, East suggested that those of us representing seats in Great Britain had no acquaintance with personation. But we have. I remember in the last general election one of the leading Conservative councillors on the Epping Forest district council going to her polling station only to find that her vote had already been recorded. For such cases as come to light there are many others. This is an abuse which occurs in every part of the United Kingdom and in some parts of the United Kingdom more than others.

To legislate as though the abuse were confined to Northern Ireland makes people unfamiliar with the Province imagine it as at best eccentric and at worst almost ungovernable, whereas those who go there—and more hon. Members should go there—prepared for their visits only by what they see or hear on the mass media express surprise that so much of life is so normal and that so many people are completely law abiding at election times as well as at other times.

It has been suggested that personation in Great Britan is an Irish custom which has accompanied immigration from Ireland and elsewhere. Be that as it may, I deprecate the persistence of successive Governments in the unnecessary duplication of legislation by the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

Government supporters are always being told that it is the aim of our leaders and of our Whips to have a lighter legislative programme. I think that it is the temptation of Whips sometimes to keep the boys busy. So we legislate on dog licences first for Northern Ireland and then for Great Britain.

In this case, is Northern Ireland being used as the laboratory for an experiment, to be followed by similar legislation for Great Britain? Is that perhaps what is in the minds of the Northern Ireland Office, or is it just one more example of the differentiation of Northern Ireland from Great Britain, which is so injurious to the cause of the Union and to morale in Ulster? Is it part of that obsession in the Northern Ireland Office with the separate sanctity of the Northern Ireland statute book — what might almost be described as a bureaucratic Sinn Fein? I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will understand that this treatment of Northern Ireland as a special case—an extraordinary province different if not all that distant from Wales, Scotland and England—causes Unionists to mistrust the professions that we are always hearing that the Union is safe. This in turn impedes good relations with Dublin by rendering suspect the most innocent and mutually advantageous intergovernmental exchanges.

Since personation is not confined to one province of the United Kingdom, there could be a single Bill in which the matter was dealt with, and this is not such a Bill. I do not see on the Treasury Bench any Minister from the Home Office, but I imagine that the Home Office is studying the Bill and what may follow from it.

Some years ago I proposed that every citizen should provide himself or herself with an identity card bearing his or her photograph and signature. I was denounced for fascist tendencies by the Daily Mirror, and I have been denounced today by the Liberal party. The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) said that on no account would the people of the United kingdom tolerate any return to identity cards.

When identity cards were voluntary in this place, I obtained one. I found it useful and convenient and a protection. I found it useful to be able to identify myself rather than to have laboriously to satisfy vigilant security people that I meant no harm and would do no damage. Are we in this place second-class citizens—we who have by resolution of the house decided that we should have identity cards?

Some form of identification bearing the holder's signature and photograph is the key to the identification of a voter in an election. It would be much better to have a single document to check the bona fides of a voter than the prescribed documents which are mentioned in the notes on clauses, which have been mentioned and circulated by the Secretary of State and which are to be the subject of regulations.

Driving licences have been mentioned in the debate as one of the presented documents. In Northern Ireland at least a driving licence bears a photograph of the holder. But I suppose that there is nothing to stop a voter in Northern Ireland presenting the driving licence that he has acquired while sojourning in Great Britain. Medical cards do not carry photographs, and I ask whether they cannot be easily forged.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) mentioned passports. It will be sufficient to produce a United Kingdom passport or a passport of the Republic of Ireland. Both carry photographs. But there might be some difficulty in strongly Republican areas about producing a United Kingdom passport, and perhaps in strongly Loyalist areas about producing a passport of the Republic of Ireland. Hon. Members who represent Northern Ireland constituencies will know better than I whether that is the case.

There is no doubt that the provisions of the Bill will make polling a complicated business. I have seen with my own eyes the queues and the disorder arising from queues at polling stations in the Bogside and the Creggan. I am glad that the Secretary of State said that his mind was not closed and that he would consider all the arguments put forward in the debate.

Clause 6 refers to expense. Although the notes on clauses suggest what might be the additional cost, I think that it will be for the convenience of the House if my hon.

[Sir John Biggs-Davison]

Friend the Under-Secretary of State tells the House in the Chamber so that it may be on the record what additional staff will be required.

On clause 3, it will also be interesting to know why a person should not be deemed to have committed the offence with which the clause deals if he has possession of documents in advance of polling day. If preparations are being made for massive personation, why will the clause apply only to the possession of documents on the day of polling? There may be a good reason for it, but I shall be glad to hear about it from the Minister. In endorsing the principle of the Bill we must ensure that it is effective. The points that have been raised, while they are Committee points, are of the greatest importance. My question, which I hope my hon. Friend will answer when he replies, is: will it work?

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the fact that the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) has brought a little more realism to the debate by reminding us that this problem is not peculiar to Northern Ireland. I was interested to hear the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) say that if there were personation in England there would be an outcry. I can assure him that it is not an accepted fact of life when it takes place in Northern Ireland. There is an outcry.

After two recent elections, supporters of the Alliance party came to me angrily because their votes had been pinched. A rector's wife was highly annoyed. Although there has recently been a high number of tendered ballots in West Belfast and Foyle, people do not normally bother because at that stage it is too late anyway. It is only relevant if there is to be an electoral court to test the validity of the election. It must be recognised that to go down that road, as we have discovered, causes other problems. I think of the genuine challenge in Armagh when a candidate was returned who was not validly nominated according to the law of the land. The reaction of the community as a result of that electoral court can still be found to this day.

I do not believe that the practice of personation is a new venture. If my memory is correct, there was an allegation that the former Member for Belfast, West received many personated votes. Evidence was provided, but despite that the matter was never taken to the electoral court because of the psychological obstacle to trying to unseat a person in that way. People imagine that it is a challenge to the vote. We must face that. To say that people can tender a ballot which can then be tested is flying in the face of reality. We should try to deal with the matter a little better.

I am delighted that the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) has managed to get away from the fog of Belfast. I welcome him on his first appearance on the Opposition Front Bench as a spokesman for Northern Ireland. It was the self-same fog which kept me from being present when the Secretary of State opened the debate. I apologise for the fact that I did not hear all his speech, only the end of it. What I did hear, and the subsequent arguments in the debate, at least encourage me to ask whether the Government, before the Committee stage and before they use their undoubted weight in the House, will think again. While the measure applies to only part of the United Kingdom, it opens up principles which could be applicable to all the United Kingdom. Therefore, I feel strongly that some of the provisions need to be re-examined.

Perhaps on a political level we might be a little more honest than some other parts of the United Kingdom when we recognise the presence of personation. Everyone would like to see it minimised, if not completely obliterated. However, I doubt whether the measures here proposed will accomplish that objective.

Speaker after speaker has pinpointed the haste in presenting the Bill. There has been some improvement in the documents suggested, but we still have at least a reflection of the earlier list that was put out for discussion, when, among other things, a rent book was suggested as a valid document for claiming one's vote. The civil servants who designed that list for the then Secretary of State forgot that in certain parts of Belfast and other parts of Ulster people gladly give away their rent books. It would not necessarily be a valid means of identification.

There is a desire to increase participation by the electorate. Forgive me if I felt a tinge of cynicism when reading some of the background papers and hearing comments in the debate. All that seems to be important is that we have our name on the franchise. If people cannot exercise their vote, that is another matter. It is our obligation to make it easier rather than more difficult for people to exercise their franchise. The bright people in other constituencies of the United Kingdom might have no problems, but I have met constituents going to vote who were unsure whether they could exercise their franchise because they had mislaid their polling cards. If they are sensitive at that level, what will happen if we list a variety of documents that have already been proved incapable of substantiating the identification of a particular person? It will increase the confusion of the average citizen, who will wonder whether he can vote without a particular document.

I at least ask that greater consideration be given to the plea that there should be a common form of identification. It would be useful to have it throughout the United Kingdom. I know that the libertarian lobby will come out against that. But at the heart of our democracy is not only the right to be on the franchise but the right to exercise that franchise if it is to be meaningful. Therefore, if we are to restrict some liberties in Northern Ireland to protect us from some evils, we should at least consider extending that protection throughout the United Kingdom.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West expressed concern about the role of the police and the powers of search in the Bill. The clauses dealing with those issues could be misunderstood dramatically by many. On the other hand, I welcome the fact that the Bill gives some power to the police which until now has not obtained in electoral law.

Time and again policemen have been on duty outside polling stations who are trained to observe. They regularly saw people going into polling stations two or three times, but they were not allowed to comment on that fact. Time and again people asked me why the police were not maintaining the law and why they let people into a polling station to vote more than once. The trouble was that the police had no power. That power rested with presiding officers who, for various reasons, failed to issue the requisite challenges. We must strengthen the power of presiding officers to challenge those whom they suspect of personation.

The Government's proposals will have a minimal effect on the alleged militaristic approach to the stealing of votes. Those who currently abuse the system will speedily devise new methods of abusing it. If we are anxious to deal with those who, in the words of the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) carry the Armalite in one hand and a stolen ballot paper in the other, we must urge the Government to implement the Baker report's recommendation of banning those people from political life until they disown violence. I would go further and proscribe such parties. That would also solve other problems and it would give us time to work out a method of identification to safeguard electors in all parts of the United Kingdom. The Government's blunt instrument will be counter-productive in the long run.

8.12 pm

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): The Bill, which I support in principle, has been introduced with the best of intentions. The previous Secretary of State for Northern Ireland made it clear to the Northern Ireland Assembly in 1982 that he thought that personation was a problem and that he would like to reach agreement with the parties participating in the Assembly on how to deal with it.

The purpose of the Bill is to ensure that personation, which could distort election results in Northern Ireland, is abolished or at least minimised. We should thank Northern Ireland Ministers for recognising that there is a problem and that all the constitutional parties in the Province want to deal with it.

When I first read the Bill, I thought that hardly any hon. Member could oppose it. I have listened to a number of speeches and I understand the opposition of some Northern Ireland Members, but, in fairness to the Secretary of State and his colleagues, we ought to accept that the Government are entitled to the benefit of the doubt. We do not have identity cards at present, the Bill will apply only to Northern Ireland and the Government are trying to make voting not much more difficult than it already is in Northern Ireland — I know that many people have difficulties in voting.

Mr. McCusker: The hon. Gentleman talks about the benefit of the doubt, but does he not believe that the benefit of the doubt should be given to the person who probably has the right to vote, rather than to the Government, who may be preventing that person from voting?

Mr. Brown: I concede that point. There is a problem of personation and, in trying to deal with it, we will inevitably place a burden on the overwhelming majority of citizens in the Province who want to exercise their democratic rights. I do not know how we can solve that problem unless we deal with it on a nationwide basis. My hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) was right to point out that, although there is not much personation in the rest of the United Kingdom, many hon. Members will know constituents who have been unable to cast their votes and, certainly in England, are not aware of the tendered vote process.

The Bill presents difficulties and perhaps the Government should conclude from the debate that even after the Bill has become law the Home Office should consider the problem in a United Kingdom context.

I join those who have suggested that the idea of identity cards is no longer taboo. Circumstances have changed since the war. All hon. Members have an identity card which carries their photograph and signature and could include their address. The introduction of such cards would be an ideal system if the Government considered the problem on a United Kingdom basis.

However, an immediate problem faces the Northern Ireland electorate. It is because the problem of personation has grown by leaps and bounds in recent years that Northern Ireland Ministers have recognised that there is an immediate need to deal with it. They have not shown undue haste, but they are bringing the Bill forward quickly because they wish to ensure that the disgraceful practice of personation is controlled by the time of the next elections in Northern Ireland.

I agree with the hon. Members who have mentioned the difficulties presented by the prescribed documents. However, when we attack the inadequacies of those documents, we have to answer the question that is bound to be posed by the Secretary of State, which is, "What other documents could be used?"

The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) suggested that there could be a greater role for the poll card. Every elector on the register is sent such a card. It says on it that it is not a requirement that the person should take it to the polling station. I recognise that this may be a matter for the Home Office rather than the Northern Ireland Office, but those prescribed documents might be more acceptable if there was a requirement to take the polling card along to the polling station. Indeed, everyone in the United Kingdom is sent a card.

Mr. McCusker: I say it in the nicest possible way, but the hon. Gentleman is demonstrating his ignorance of the situation in Northern Ireland. Polling cards are easily available in the Province. Indeed, one of the incidents that, I believe, brought the whole issue to the Government's attention involved the RUC stopping a minibus in Fermanagh and South Tyrone during one of the recent elections. It contained people from the Irish Republic—some of them from as far away as County Cork—who had fistfulls of polling cards for people in the Fermanagh and South Tyrone electoral area. They were clearly on their way to personate those voters.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. It was an idea that was put forward from the perspective of an English Member of Parliament, and in England that is not a problem.

However, there is another problem which, sadly, the Bill does not deal with — voter registration and the inaccuracy of the electoral register. In the United Kingdom any elector has the right to be registered in more than one place. I am registered as an elector in the London borough in which I live when I am attending to my parliamentary duties, but I am also registered as a voter in my own constituency. It is illegal for me to vote anywhere other than in my constituency or in the constituency in which I live in London. I am convinced that in Northern Ireland many people may be registered in more than one constituency and probably cast votes in more than one constituency.

[Mr. Brown]

I wonder whether there is any purpose in giving people in the United Kingdom the right to be on more than one electoral register. I say that with reference at least to parliamentary elections, although it would be difficult perhaps to differentiate on the electoral register between local government and parliamentary elections. The Home Office should consider that point, because that may be one of the problems in Northern Ireland. However, perhaps it should be considered in the wider context of electoral reform and the Bill that will be introduced later this Session.

The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) gave us a critical analysis of the prescribed documents. He drew attention to clause 1(2)(1B) which provides:

"Where a voter produces a prescribed document, the presiding officer or clerk to whom it is produced shall deliver a ballot paper to the voter unless the officer or clerk decides that the document raises a reasonable doubt".

But one of the main problems about these documents, which was raised first by the right hon. Gentleman and later by other hon. Members, is that, for example, a voter may use his medical card which contains his name but which bears an address that does not correspond to that on the electoral register. In all honesty the voter can take his medical card along as a prescribed document. But he may have moved several times since the medical card was issued, and if the lack of correspondence between his addresses is seen as something that gives rise to a "reasonable doubt", he may be deprived of his vote. However, the date of birth will also appear on the medical card and that might help in some small way to allay some of the fears expressed by the right hon. Member for South Down.

As I said in my intervention in the speech of the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) it is illegal not to notify the appropiate authorities if the address on a driving licence—whether it be a United Kingdom or Northern Ireland licence—is inaccurate. However, that does not detract from the arguments that have been put about the difficulties involved in these prescribed documents.

I shall vote for the Bill because its intentions are entirely honourable. We should pay tribute to the Government for recognising the problem and introducing legislation. However, I hope that the Northern Ireland Office will take careful note of the voices that have been raised against the Bill, because they are based on the experiences of those who have to stand as candidates using the electoral system in Northern Ireland. They have already foreseen, in a way that I have not, some of the dificulties that will arise. Therefore, I hope that the Northern Ireland Office will give due credit to some of the arguments that have been raised against the Bill. If, after one or two local government or parliamentary elections, it appears that the prescribed documents do not satisfy the intentions of the Northern Ireland Office or of hon. Members, we may have to consider a much wider reform in the context of the whole of the United Kingdom, with the Home Office introducing proposals that involve the possibility of the citizens of the United Kingdom holding identity cards.

Mr. A. Cecil Walker (Belfast, North): As several hon. Members have said, personation as we know it has always been a fact of life in Northern Ireland, where a few ardent supporters of a particular candidate might try to obtain an advantage by voting more than once. However, the practice was never considered widespread and the number of votes obtained by that process was minimal in proportion to the number of votes cast. That was the situation until the paramilitary groups decided that the political arena would be a desirable platform from which they could don a cloak of respectability and at the same time use the process in an effort to enlist sympathy for their cause.

Everyone in Northern Ireland knows that such groups do not have the electoral support that the results of previous elections would suggest. One has only to witness the blatant vote-stealing that goes on at polling stations in various electoral areas to know that such behaviour can produce a result that is completely contrary to the electorate's wishes. As has been said, the right to vote is the cornerstone of democracy, and I am pleased that the Government have now recognised that that right must be protected.

I support the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) and the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) when they say that electoral abuse is not peculiar to Northern Ireland and that the various safeguards outlined in the Bill could have a much wider application. I understand that there have been many reported instances of electoral irregularities throughout the United Kingdom, and now that the nettle has been grasped, I should have thought that such legislation could be applied throughout the United Kingdom.

During elections, I have personally witnessed carloads of vote-stealers invading polling stations in areas where conditions were tailor-made for electoral abuse. Those areas contained large concentrations of derelict and blocked-up houses because the population had moved because of redevelopment plans. Voting regulations enabled the votes of the previous occupants to be stolen. Groups of dedicated paramilitaries had reconnoitred the area, identified the vacant properties, compared them with the electoral register and, having confirmed that votes were applicable to the properties, conducted a well-organised vote-stealing campaign. Groups of personators descended on the polling stations and, using disguises and candidates' election addresses as a form of documentation, demanded voting papers. Some succeeded.

The constables on duty at polling stations are well aware of what goes on. On the some occasions they try to halt the personators, but lack of evidence and lack of authority make that difficult.

Polling agents sometimes challenge individuals but they are often verbally abused. In some areas presiding officers are not over-anxious to take appropriate action. If the offender leaves the station without casting a vote, that is the end of the matter.

The Bill recognises the situation. Clause 3 lays down grounds which will allow the police to act in a more determined manner to apprehend personators. I welcome that. I am pleased that the Bill also contains provision for the searching of vehicles when it is suspected that they are being used for personation purposes.

Care must be exercised over the impartiality of presiding officers and their clerks because of the responsibilities thrust upon them. Reports have been made about intimidation. That accounts for their unwillingness to challenge personators.

The strengthening of police powers will instil confidence in the polling stations, but pressures can be applied in Northern Ireland on a person's everyday life by those whose declared aim is to disrupt or destroy our democratic system.

There is an inherent risk that the requirement to produce proof of identity will alienate some voters. We cannot rule out the possibility that some people may never again exercise their right to vote and will be lost to the democratic process. I hope and trust that voters will realise that the measures proposed are designed to protect their votes and their electoral rights. If the electoral process is discredited people will be dissuaded from voting. I am sure that voters will believe that we are trying to provide a sound electoral process, free from manipulation.

The prescribed documents have been chosen because they are available to all electors. The word "available" worries me. The ready availability of some of the documents will encourage unscrupulous paramilitary vote-stealers to borrow such documents so that they may vote for a particular candidate. Supplementary benefit and pension books are particularly easy to obtain by third parties. Elderly or infirm people in particular often ask others to collect their benefit. The documentary evidence could be used for purposes which were never intended.

Medical cards are also a problem because they are readily available. An elderly person could be persuaded to give up the card in the belief that the candidate of their choice would receive their vote without the need to make their way to the polling station. That will apply particularly if the polling station is inaccessible.

More attention should be given to the siting of polling stations. In my area, the electoral officer seems deliberately to put polling stations in the highest positions. That makes it almost impossible for senior citizens to attend. At the last election, it was pathetic to see the elderly, many of them on crutches or walking aids, struggling to negotiate inclines which would exhaust the able-bodied. By the use of such stations, many pensioners and infirm people are denied the right to exercise their franchise. The way is left wide open for manipulators to engage in exploitation, to the detriment of the democratic process.

One method of ensuring that democracy operates is that which is accepted in many countries, most recently in Nicaragua. After voting, the voter is required to have his thumb stamped with a dye which disappears after two or three days. It is a painless and simple operation which would be accepted by an electorate which was aware of what is happening and which is as anxious as we are to uphold the right to vote.

I have talked to my constituents and not one has voiced an objection to that suggestion. They say that in view of the abuses of the system, they appreciate that extra conditions may be required of them before they exercise their right to vote. They prefer that system to producing identification documents.

In an eloquent speech, the hon. Member for Epping Forest mentioned ID cards. The issue of identity cards would be a major change and raise fundamental questions of principle, particularly in Northern Ireland, but ID cards would deal effectively with personation and be of immense value on security and social fronts. Many of us will remember the identity cards carried during the last war. They were essential for the safety of the nation. Northern Ireland is at war. Law-abiding people will certainly not object to carrying ID cards. Citizens of many other countries carry such cards in their social security documentation.

Other matters must be considered, such as including a resident's date of birth on the annual registration form. That would assist in the identification of personators. Electors should be required to state their date of birth, but that information need not appear publicly on the electoral roll. It need be included only on the central register and on copies used by clerks at polling stations. We need to examine the Bill in detail.

In general, the electorate of Northern Ireland will appreciate the need for such a Bill and the reassurance of confidence in democratic institutions.

8.39 pm

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): I support right hon. and hon. Members in their expressions of fear about the inadequacies of the Bill. However, we must express our appreciation to the Secretary of State for so clearly setting his mind to such an important matter. The legislation's intention is honourable. We must express our thanks to the Government for recognising such a serious problem in the Province.

I represent a constituency where a few votes can affect the outcome of an election. I have a majority of 78, and I know how many votes were personated by the Sinn Fein. Therefore, there is some urgency to the matter. I must warn the Secretary of State that this legislation could be rushed—although, I accept, with the best intentions—but rushed legislation and rushed law is not in the best interests of the people of the United Kingdom.

The problem of personation—or vote stealing, to give it its honest title—has a long tradition not only in Northern Ireland but throughout Ireland. The old maxim of "Vote early and vote often" was heard in our childhood during election campaigns. Physical resurrections are common on election day. I have great reverence for the best book of all, the Holy Bible, which speaks about a day of resurrection. I assure the House that that was never intended to be election day.

Such old phrases as "Lend me your coat to vote" are funny, but there is a serious aspect. Many of those in Republican circles sit around the pub table proclaiming their heroism because of stealing a vote, thereby not permitting someone to vote. During the last election, a priest aged over 50 in part of my constituency could not get to the polling booth. However, a 17-year old, claiming that he was the priest, voted for Sinn Fein. I know of a hard-working Protestant family from outside Omagh—a father, mother and four sons—who returned from a hard day's work and went to vote, but found that Sinn Fein had taken their votes. Six of my constituents were robbed of their right to choose a Member of Parliament.

Regardless of the lighthearted manner with which the subject is often treated, it is a serious problem. It takes on a more sinister aspect during each election. Vote stealing is as well organised by Sinn Fein as are other crimes committed by fellow gangsters in the IRA. Violence at polling booths, and intimidation of polling clerks, party workers and presiding officers are prevalent. In West Belfast on one occasion Sinn Fein thugs literally took over the polling station. Party workers can find themselves in a dangerous position. To challenge personators is to risk their lives. I pay tribute to my party workers during the recent general election. They challenged members of the Sinn Fein, who recently appeared in court and were fined for personation.

The problem must be dealt with effectively. The Secretary of State has estimated that as much as 20 per cent. of the Sinn Fein vote is stolen. A party that has no reservations about supporting, and even participating in, murder would have no compunction about engaging in wholesale theft of votes. All political parties in Northern Ireland have been calling for action to stop that and to prevent the open flouting of the law by Sinn Fein and its supporters.

Right hon. and hon. Members support the call for action and have endorsed wholeheartedly the principle underlying the legislation. However, we must address our minds to the question whether the legislation will work and whether it is the legislation that we need. I agree with the increase in fines and prison sentences. I trust that the court will impose maximum sentences as a deterrent to those considering stealing a vote. Often derisory sentences have been handed out. Those who take part in such organised theft know that they have little to fear.

My main reservation about the measure is that the documents suggested for identification are insufficient to prevent vote stealing. Many of them have no photographs and a number, such as medical cards, can be easily copied. I have always supported the introduction of identification cards, which would include a photograph and several other details. They could be punched or marked when a vote had been cast. There could be different marks for different elections. That system operates in some universities where student union cards must be produced and marked before the ballot paper is handed over.

I listened with interest to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Walker) about dye on the thumb. Knowing the IRA, it would not be past its ingenuity to obtain a product to remove the dye. Indeed, there may be a great increase in the number of thumb suckers during an election.

Other hon. Members on both sides of the House have dealt adequately with the failure of the legislation to deal with this most important matter. However, I recognise and commend the work of the Secretary of State in considering this serious problem. Sinn Fein is the real concern of constitutional politicians and parties. It has no respect for either the ballot box or democracy. It is my honest, considered opinion that to permit Sinn Fein to stand in and use the democratic process makes a mockery of the ballot box. It should not be allowed to exploit both the Armalite and the ballot box.

Constitutional parties know that it is hard enough to get people to vote on election day. It is not the intention of the House to stop those who genuinely want to vote and choose their representatives. I trust that there will not be any undue hindrance put in the way of those who have a right and a desire to vote.

While constitutional parties find it difficult to persuade people to vote, Sinn Fein is ready to use the ballot box and to claim a great number of votes that it has stolen on election day. I trust that the Government will grasp the nettle and proscribe Sinn Fein. That will stop it using the ballot box with one hand while holding the Armalite with the other. I trust that the Secretary of State or the Minister of State will give us some hope in that direction. The people of Ulster are crying out that the body called Sinn Fein should no longer have the right to stand for elections until it renounces the Armalite and violence and turns its back upon them.

8.50 pm

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): I should have liked wholeheartedly to welcome the Secretary of State to his new post. I should have done so if he had introduced a better Bill as his first piece of proposed legislation. I hope that a change will be made in the near future and that I shall soon have an opportunity to welcome him wholeheartedly to his new post as Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

The majority of reasonable and decent people in both sections of the community in Northern Ireland are honest and upright citizens. They are suffering from what I describe as election fatigue. In many areas fewer voters are turning out to exercise their democratic right. As they withdraw from participation in election processes, so the door opens wider to admit those who use and abuse the democratic process to promote selected candidates who are sponsored by organisations which have contempt for the high ideals of freedom, justice and democracy. There is a need to rationalise the system, especially one which in Northern Ireland requires elections to be held to choose representatives for district councils, the Northern Ireland Assembly, the House of Commons and the European Parliament. All these representatives are chosen in separate elections. We are fortunate in Northern Ireland to have one year in five that is free from elections.

The opportunists who personate in a militaristic manner have many opportunities to practise and perfect their skills in vote-stealing. The principle that each elector is entitled to exercise his or her vote, or right to vote, in an election is a right and just principle. It is our responsibility to ensure that what is right in principle can be practised, and that the conditions necessary to protect the principle are perfected here in Westminster in legislation. I think that we are all agreed that the abuse of personation must be stopped in Northern Ireland and throughout the United Kingdom. On this occasion we are merely asking the Government to give us a realistic method of identifying an elector who wishes to exercise this franchise and to protect that voter from personation by another.

There is always some truth in wisecracks and legpulls. The slogan "Vote early and vote often" is in itself an incitement to personation. We cannot get away from the fact that using the votes of the dead, those who are absent on holiday or those who for other reasons are unable to exercise their own vote is no different from stealing the vote of someone who supports an opposing party. Both acts are equally dishonest and deplorable.

Considerable moves have been made in Northern Ireland. There used to be a hue and cry daily about discrimination. There have been many boundary commission reports implemented in recent years. Changes have been accepted and there is now no gerrymandering of ward or constituency boundaries to advantage the Unionist majority. Indeed, there appears to be positive action or discrimination to weaken the influence of the majority in Ulster. That is one reason why many in Northern Ireland do not exercise their right to vote and thereby afford opportunities for personation. There is resentment that Ulster is the only part of the United Kingdom which is forced to use proportional representation for council, Assembly and European elections. The majority in Northern Ireland believes passionately that only those practices that are good enough for the mainland should be used in Northern Ireland. Proportional representation is obviously not good enough or acceptable for the mainland and the system should be scrapped in Northern Ireland, even though that would not contribute much to reducing personation.

If the Government believe that by introducing the Bill in its present form they will prevent the widespread personation that is practised in Northern Ireland, experience will prove the Ulster Unionists right, as has happened time after time. We get no satisfaction in the House in saying, "We told you so.". This is a matter of which Members representing mainland constituencies have little experience as yet, and I emphasise "yet". That was true also of attacks on policemen by the criminals among picketing miners. The mainland has not had much experience either of petrol bombs being thrown at policemen by mobsters, despite the fact that that force, including the Royal Ulster Constabulary in Northern Ireland, is admired throughout the world by law-abiding citizens. It is not worth while tinkering with legislation to prevent personation. The Government must be ruthless in their determination to prevent the abuses that have recently occurred. Vote-stealing is only another card in the pack of those who supplement their funds through bank and payroll robberies and raids on post offices to promote revolutionary change and to destroy democratic systems and institutions.

Proper identification with a photograph or the signature of the holder attached to the card could prevent, or at the very least substantially reduce, personation. It could help to reduce the fraudulent collection of benefits, pensions, and so on when documents are stolen. Probably more than ever, in 1984 people are accustomed to having cards, passes and some type of identification with them. Such election cards — I do not want to refer to them as identity cards — could last for up to 10 years. The holders who present authentic identification would be assured of the right to exercise their vote.

Even in my constituency — one to which reference has been made — where there is a low turnout, there is some evidence of personation. It is true to say that what has occurred in parts of my constituency where there was a head-on assault by another ally of Sinn Fein — people masqueraded as Irish Independents — has happened elsewhere. I know of one case where a son was alleged to be a strong supporter of an extremist group. He voted before his father came home from work, thereby disfranchising his father. Such abuse can create many kinds of problems, not only between parties but within families.

Prescribed documents that have no attached photographs are useless and should be avoided. The greatest alleged offenders and exploiters of personation are members of Sinn Fein, and we should not be under any illusion about the fact that restricting organised personation will have any impact on Sinn Fein's campaign. Sinn Fein seeks no mandate through the ballot box for its murderous campaign. Danny Morrison has already said that Sinn Fein will take power in Ireland, in the north now and in the south later. Perhaps that will happen sooner rather than later in the Irish Republic where economic and social conditions provide a nursery for revolution. I trust that the Government will think again about this Bill and accept our suggestions.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): During a debate only a few weeks ago, I suggested that too much had been made of what we mistakenly regard as the electoral advances of Sinn Fein. I said that I could never fully understand the near-hysteria — "hysteria" is the only word that I could use — that swept Whitehall and Fleet street in the immediate aftermath of the Assembly elections in 1982. That hysteria occurred for the simple reason that Sinn Fein had achieved 64,000 votes. My puzzlement arose because, in 1921, in an election for the first Northern Ireland Parliament — the election was held in the same area and under exactly the same conditions, with proportional representation and all the rest of it — Sinn Fein received 104,000 votes. During the 60 years in between, Sinn Fein's support peaked and dipped. On occasions, Sinn Fein representatives have won seats in this House. So what? They do not attend; they do not take those seats.

At the general election in 1983 Gerry Adams won the seat for Belfast, West, and again, I say, so what? He does not attend. The interests of the people of Belfast, West are looked after in the House by Ulster Members occupying other seats and by hon. Members representing seats in Great Britain, because we all take part in the great national debates. Only one elected Member out of 650 neglects and fails to do his duty. To a great extent, individual constituency cases in Belfast, West are dealt with by those of us who represent constituencies on the borders of that constituency.

Sinn Fein election victories are nothing new. Its absenteeism from the place to which it was elected is nothing new and nor is there anything new in it neglecting its parliamentary duties.

If the purpose of the Bill is to contain and curb the growth of electoral support for Sinn Fein — even bogus support and bogus growth — an alternative is to demonstrate that Sinn Fein duplicity will not work. It cannot and will not be accorded facilities that enable it to claim that results can be achieved by a combination of political and terrorist methods.

A commendable pattern has been firmly established by the Minister of State who refused to meet Sinn Fein members of a deputation only two weeks ago. I do not say that he is alone in that. I hope that his behaviour on that occasion is typical of what we can expect from the Secretary of State and all his colleagues. If Ministers, Departments and statutory bodies — it is important to include that leg of the stool — were always to remember that Sinn Fein representatives regard the Armalite as more powerful than the ballot box, and that the ballot box is regarded by them as an endorsement of their campaign of murder, matters would be put in their proper perspective. Sinn Fein has deliberately chosen the alternative of violence and force. It should not be given the added bonus of being able to pretend that it is genuinely elected.

Sinn Fein's strength, such as it is, results from its being able to play things both ways. I hope that the Minister of State and all his colleagues will put a stop to all that.

The Secretary of State was right when he listed all the electoral malpractices and abuses, and we join him in saying that the joking has to stop. We all hoped and expected that the draftsmen could have provided an effective measure. I do not necessarily suggest that it should be 100 per cent. effective, because we can never achieve perfection in this wicked world, but surely to goodness they could have come nearer the target than the provisions contained in the Bill.

The Secretary of State drew attention to what he regarded as the significant abuse of the Assembly elections in 1982. He probably chose the worst example of the mythical increase in Sinn Fein votes because in that election, which set Whitehall and Fleet street agog, Sinn Fein achieved only 64,000 votes. The Secretary of State seemed to be saying—he will correct me if I heard him wrongly—that safeguards were greatly tightened so that by the time we reached the 1983 general election, vote-stealing and personation were much less a feature of that election result.

If we study the figures on that occasion we shall see that, despite the increased safeguards, the Sinn Fein vote increased from 64,000 to 102,000. To confirm what I said about the peaks and dips of Sinn Fein's electoral fortunes, it slumped back, in what must have been for it an alarming fashion, in the EC election this year.

Mr. Scott: I know that we are all anxious to get on, but I should tell the right hon. Gentleman that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made exactly the opposite point. It was that at the general election in 1983, in our judgment, Sinn Fein made the most sustained and determined effort at personation.

Mr. Molyneaux: I can accept that. It is correct that Sinn Fein made that effort, but that does not destroy the validity of the point that I was making. The alarm and the panic seemed to set in for no reason that I can understand. I am sure that Ministers were in the same puzzled state about why there should have been all the alarm and despondency about Sinn Fein getting a mere 64,000 votes at the Assembly election.

The Secretary of State mentioned holiday votes and the possibility, which I hope has now receded, of Northern Ireland being deprived of holiday votes when the Home Secretary's Bill is considered later this Session. If the Home Secretary were to be unwise enough to carry out that threat and to refuse to grant holiday votes to Northern Ireland, he would issue an open invitation to vote-stealers. If they were certain that John Simpson, his wife and two of his family were in Majorca for two weeks, they could go to the polling station, no doubt equipped with a convincing medical card, driving licence and so on—presumably the passport would be abroad on that occasion—and get away with it. I hope that that certainty will be removed by allowing holiday-makers to vote for themselves.

Mr. Hume: Does not the right hon. Gentleman agree that if a postal vote were given to holiday-makers from Northern Ireland, the door would be wide open to total corruption of the electoral system? Once one gives holiday-makers a postal vote, every single voter has the right to a postal vote. There would be no control over voting if one granted that to Northern Ireland.

Mr. Molyneaux: When we consider the Home Secretary's Bill, I hope that the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) will be here and will have an opportunity to speak to illustrate that. If one considers the six most marginal constituencies in Great Britain, one sees that they have a high proportion of postal votes, simply because so much depends upon the postal vote facility. What is in fact proposed in the Select Committee's report on the Representation of the People Act is the granting of an alternative method of voting. I hope that hon. Members on this side of the water will set their faces against it.

The Secretary of State said that some form of identification was needed. We agree about that, but we differ on its effectiveness. Perhaps in the coming weeks we can put our heads together and devise a foolproof method.

We must take effective action to safeguard the democratic system, as the Secretary of State said, and I agree with him. We agree that every effort must be made to find an effective system. The debate has shown that there is widespread agreement that in the Bill as currently drafted we have not come near to finding it. It was that difficulty in finding any form of effective system of identification that caused the delay, to which the Secretary of State legitimately referred, in bringing forward legislation in the reign of another Secretary of State. Unfortunately the present Secretary of State has been landed with this baby. The difficulty in providing an effective form of identification rather than an unwillingness to stamp out vote-stealing was the problem all along. That is even recognised by the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) wondered whether the 1983 general election results might have been different if there had been no vote-stealing. I think that it will be generally recognised by those who have studied the statistics that even if personation and vote-stealing had not been on the scale on which they were generally supposed to have been, and the Bill had been in force, it would have made no difference to the outcome in the 17 seats.

Mr. Archer: I am grateful for the opportunity to elucidate what I said if it was not clear. I specifically said that I was not suggesting that the result would have been different in the last election, but the margins were so narrow that one could imagine it being different in some future election as a result of vote-stealing.

Mr. Molyneaux: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for that clarification.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman also seemed to chide me for my comments in the debate on the Gracious Speech when I said that we were prepared to accept that safeguards might be necessary but that it should be recognised that that also applied to various other areas of the United Kingdom. I was referring to complaints made in the House in July by Members representing certain areas of England and Wales. I pointed out that there had been fairly recent instances of personation on a significant scale in the island of Great Britain and that the franchise had been abused there as well as in Northern Ireland in recent elections. Proof of that was furnished by Members representing those areas.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): In Leicester there was definite evidence of personation and I believe that the same was true in other cities. In areas of multi-occupied housing, or with a large ethnic community, there is a temptation and under the present system there is no definite means of disproving the entitlement to vote of a person who appears at the polling station with the relevant polling card. There is no way of proving that he is not who he says he is.

Mr. Molyneaux: I am grateful for that confirmation of the fears expressed on that earlier occasion, which I know are shared by many Opposition Members. I hope that by the end of our protracted deliberations on the Bill we shall all be a great deal wiser and able to devise means of eradicating this plague from the whole of the United Kingdom.

My right hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) rightly said that the House should not be asked to approve the Bill without seeing the regulations. Without the regulations the Bill is meaningless, so it is vital that we should have sight of them in definitive form before the end of the Committee stage, let alone the remaining stages of the Bill. The documents listed in unofficial form are all documents that the citizens is not legally required to hold. If their holding is a condition of the right to vote, what is the objection to stipulating that an effective identity card must be held and produced?

My right hon. Friend the Member for South Down pointed out that party representatives and agents were prevented from examining the documents of proof and thus from giving any view on the validity of the claim that the person presenting them was indeed the person named on the register. Whatever the drafting, and whatever the intention may have been, the role of party agents is bound to be reduced. My hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) made that quite clear. Representatives of candidates have a vital role to play in the democratic process at general elections and indeed other elections.

Enough has already been said in the debate to illustrate the ineffectiveness of all the documents so far listed. Right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House clearly fear that the Bill in its present form may make the situation worse rather than better. If by any mischance our amendment is defeated and the Bill is committed to a Committee of the whole House and if the Committee begins next Tuesday, we shall bear in mind the Secretary of State's undertaking to consider what has been said in the debate so that changes can be made, presumably in the list and the regulations, before the Bill completes its passage through Parliament. However, the Secretary of State cannot be expected to come to any conclusion in the 120 hours that remain before the commencement of Committee stage on Tuesday. The Government have now set their hand to this measure, the object of which we all support in principle. Perhaps they might consider beginning the Committee stage next Tuesday—if they feel that they must do so—but, with the agreement of the business managers, allowing a reasonable period to elapse before the House is invited to complete the remaining stages of what is generally admitted to be an ill-thought-out Bill.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I apologise for my absence from the House earlier this evening. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) explained, I was in Belfast. The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) made some kind references to my visit. After my recent appointment as a Front Bench spokesman on Northern Ireland affairs, I wanted to make an early acquaintance with Northern Ireland. I was able to see a great deal in a short time, to speak a little and to listen a great deal. Those who live in Northern Ireland will find that I shall visit the Province frequently and that I shall be sympathetic to their problems.

I have listened to the debate with some care, and it seems to me that the elected representatives of Northern Ireland are apprehensive about losing the baby with the bathwater. There is concern about personation and about illicit practices connected with the ballot box, but hon. Members are not entirely sure that the Government have found the right way to proceed. They want to protect the democratic system but at the same time to be sure that there is no prejudice to that system.

The Government have an obligation to ensure that electoral results in Northern Ireland are not distorted by personation. The hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea) pointed out that he owes his seat here to a majority of 78. There are in Northern Ireland four constituencies where the majority is less than 3,000. We are dealing with an important point of political principle, but any change can and will have serious effects. We are dealing with a fundamental right to vote, and that fundamental right must be inviolate.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) told us that he did not believe that 20,000 cases of personation took place. The Secretary of State prefaced his remarks with the words "some observers believe". He was right to do so. I spoke to an electoral officer in Belfast, and he told me that he believed that personation could not in any practical sense surpass 1 per cent. of the vote. The Secretary of State referred to the fact that tendered ballots returned amounted to 762 and 949 votes respectively in the last two elections. As he said, those figures might represent the sum total of those who felt sufficiently exercised to register a tendered ballot paper by way of protest. Whether the figure is one in five, or 1 per cent., I do not know. However, in his report of 1982-83, the chief electoral officer of Northern Ireland declared:

> "It is most difficult to ascertain the actual level of personation that takes place. What is clear however is that there is a perception of a high level abuse and accordingly the present legislation appears to be inadequate to meet the needs of the situation."

He added that there should be consideration of changes in the arrangements for postal votes. The Government take that point, and I understand that they are making provision for a tightening-up of procedure with relation to postal votes, through the Representation of the People Acts. The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) was anxious about his constituency. He seemed to base that anxiety on the concept of definite evidence about multiple-occupation dwellings. I draw his attention to the remarks of the chief electoral officer that evidence in Northern Ireland was elusive. Was the hon. Gentleman espousing the theme that was found in the speeches of the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) and the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) that there is a move to separate Northern Ireland from Great Britain, and that the personation proposals, which do not relate to the mainland, are part and parcel of the concept of a separate policy? I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will take the opportunity in Committee to expand those points.

The Opposition believe that the Government are determined not to throw out the baby with the bath water.

[Mr. Stuart Bell]

They want the checks and balances which every Government must have when dealing with legislation, and they want to ensure safeguards. The prescribed list, which will be produced during our proceedings, will be an attempt to define the documents that will be required. The tendered ballot paper was considered to be a safeguard, but it is not nearly strong enough, and there will be a challenge by way of the election petition.

The Bill appears to broaden the mechanisms of local and European elections. Those who will take part in the Committee, who have proposals for the documents that might be produced at the polling booth, will no doubt wish to take into account the fact that the Government have introduced the proposals, not to keep the whips or the business managers busy, but to get the legislation on the statute book in time for the May elections. However, having seen what the House of Lords did with the GLC election proposals, the Government might have been afraid of them. They might still have something up their sleeve with this legislation, although I understand their desire to get it on the statute book earlier rather than later.

The hon. Member for Epping Forest sought to assimilate, as he often rightly does, as it is a view that he strongly holds, the fact that elections in Northern Ireland should be the same as those on the mainland, but there will always be particularities in Northern Ireland elections which are different from our country — [Interruption.] That was a slip of the tongue, although not a Freudian slip. In his first election campaign in Northern Ireland the slogan of the right hon. Member for South Down was, "Keep Britain out", although he was referring to the EC.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Perhaps it would help the hon. Gentleman if I informed him that, according to the Department of Trade and Industry, Northern Ireland is part of Britain and its inhabitants are British for statutory purposes.

Mr. Bell: I would not dispute what the right hon. Gentleman says. I recall the debate in the House on 7 July, when the right hon. Gentleman said:

> "The rule has been never to allow Northern Ireland to cease to be separate from the rest of the United Kingdom." — [Official Report, 7 July 1983; Vol. 45, c. 459.]

I have followed the right hon. Gentleman's views with great care, and I note that he produced the most non-sectarian vote of the election, which no doubt he will remember. In that election, only 7 per cent. of Conservative candidates mentioned Northern Ireland in their election address. If it is any consolation to Conservative Members, only 5 per cent. of Labour candidates referred to it in their address, and only 2 per cent. of Liberal candidates referred to Northern Ireland in their address.

The Westminster elections are the only ones in Northern Ireland with the single-Member seat relative to the majority system. In all the others, the single transferable vote form of proportional representation is used. Therefore, in Northern Ireland, elections have a seperate agenda. Election campaigns have their own content, their own issues, and personalities which, in the words of two political commentators, Mr. Butler and Mr. Cavanagh, were a world apart from Smith square and Walworth road. As the Secretary of State said, our elections in this country—I repeat the word because we are talking about a country, as Northern Ireland is a country——

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Highlands and Islands of Scotland are worlds apart from Smith square?

Mr. Bell: I have not been that far, but in relation to the Northern Ireland election I am not sure that they have a particular role to play.

The Secretary of State said that there is not in our country—I repeat the words that I used at the beginning — paramilitary interference. We must take that into account when we consider Northern Ireland and its election problem. The Secretary of State also said that he would listen to the comments and proposals that may be made when the Bill goes into Committee. I can testify that the Secretary of State is a good listener, having spent 59 Committee sittings with him, on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill.

The Opposition believe that the appropriate course is to support Second Reading and to make representations in Committee. The objections that have to be put, and the proposals on documents that may be raised, will best be made in Committee. We also welcome the increase in the public expenditure. The Opposition always look forward to Government pronouncements of more public expenditure, and £50,000 is being made available for additional polling equipment and staff.

On balance, the Opposition believe that it is right to bring in legislation on personation. It is right for the Government to seek to balance the obvious desire not to interfere with the right to vote with an attempt to limit the insidious disease of personation, which can influence and prejudice the results of the ballot box.

9.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I welcome the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) to his new responsibility for Northern Ireland. I am delighted to hear him, and I look forward to keeping in close touch with him over the work that inevitably lies ahead for those concerned with these matters. I am also delighted that he was in Belfast last night. He will come to know that, in the winter months, one cannot always guarantee that one will be able to return on time. I congratulate him on his speech tonight.

We have had an important debate about an important Bill. Franchise and the voting system are central to the basis of our democratic system. Two responsibilities rest on our shoulders in looking after that system. The first is to see that the franchise can be freely exercised by all those who are entitled to it. The second is to protect the fairness of the system, both because it is essential that it should be seen to be fair, because its reputation is part of the base upon which it is founded, and because to deprive an elector of his vote is a blow to the concept of democracy. The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) described the practice of vote stealing as a poison within our democracy which, if allowed to flow unchecked, would have the same effect as a poison.

The justification for the Bill rests on the Government's judgment about the extent of the personation which has occurred in recent elections in Northern Ireland and on the representations made to us by all the constitutional parties in the Province. I shall be dealing with both these matters, but before I do perhaps I can deal immediately with the problem of the documents which are listed.

As was to be expected, the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) went straight to the heart of the matter when he raised various aspects of this part of the Government's proposals. Although the list of documents is not a part of the Bill and we intend to publish it in due course in an order, nevertheless the Government felt it right to include the list in the notes on clauses so that the House might discuss them in today's debate and so that the Government might take account of the various matters raised by right hon. and hon. Members.

I have to be frank with the House. I cannot say that I am 100 per cent. certain that at the moment we have it right. After all, we are moving into totally uncharted waters. The best judgment that we can make is that the list is about right, but I cannot say that after we have had some experience it will not be necessary to amend or modify the list.

The Government were urged to have the list ready by Tuesday when we came to the remaining stages of the Bill. Subject, of course, to our wish to listen to the discussions in another place when the Bill goes there, it is sensible for the Government, having heard the arguments in today's debate, to be able to give the Committee a considered view of our position before embarking on the remaining stages. As I have said, the House already has the proposed list.

We had to draw a balance. We did not want the list of documents drawn so tightly that there was a danger of disfranchising electors. But we did not want it drawn so widely and loosely that it would simply be a cover for the continuation of the activities of those who wished to undermine the electoral system. That was a difficult judgment, but I think that we have it about right.

If we are determined to get this legislation in operation in time to tackle the problem by the next local government elections in May 1985, the approach outlined in the Bill is about the best that we can do. But obviously we shall review the experience of that election and see whether any amendment needs to be made to the list.

A number of hon. Members made great play of the impact of clause 1 on the document produced and the judgment which had to be exercised by the presiding officer in cases of doubt. The clause refers to doubt about whether the voter is the person whom he represents himself to be. It does not, as some hon. Members seemed to believe, require the presiding officer to follow blindly the evidence of the document produced. He can look at the name on the document, where appropriate, at the photograph on the document and, where appropriate, at the date of birth on the document. He is not required to take notice of the address on the document. He is also required to use his own common sense in deciding whether he has a reasonable doubt that the person is the person he represents himself to be when asking for his ballot paper.

If right hon. and hon. Members feel that we have not got the wording of the clause right to achieve that end, we can turn our minds to it in Committee. I am advised that the wording has the effect not of asking the presiding officer blindly to follow the evidence of the document but of enabling him to apply his common sense and judgment in coming to a conclusion whether in practice there is a reasonable doubt.

The hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) made various suggestions for improving the system of electoral registration and tightening it up in such a way as to make personation much more difficult. It might be possible to arrive at something that was virtually foolproof. We, and in particular the chief electoral officer, continually strive to find ways of tightening up the accuracy of the register in Northern Ireland. The Government's mind is certainly not closed to the suggestions that have been made during the debate. However, those are not steps that could practically be taken in advance of the local government elections in May next year.

Some hon. Members made particular play of the medical cards, one of the documents that the Government have suggested. I freely acknowledge the limitations of that document. However, the situation will improve because over a period the old-style medical cards are being replaced by a new computer-produced document. That will be much more difficult to forge and better suited to proving the identity of an elector. The medical card is available free and universally to Northern Ireland electors. Obviously, as has been pointed out, there would be considerable advantages in restricting the documents on the list to those with a photograph, the driving licence and the passport, but they would certainly have disfranchised substantial numbers of electors in Northern Ireland, particularly in the poorer sections of the community. Therefore, while accepting that the use of the medical card for that purpose had limitations, we thought it right to include it in the list.

Hon. Members, particularly the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) mentioned the problem of the marriage certificate. After the original approach of my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) to the parties concerned in Northern Ireland, the Government made an early decision that it would be right to restrict the documents to official documents issued by a Government Department. Starting from that premise, one can see that it would not be right for us to include those marriage certificates which are issued by ministers of religion who carry out marriages in Northern Ireland.

However, in a sense, I take the hon. Gentleman's point. We recognised his point in coming to our conclusion about the marriage certificate. The House should bear in mind the fact that the gap between the qualifying dates upon which a register is compiled and the time when the register comes into effect is some five months. If the lady concerned had been married early in that period, it would be perfectly possible for her to have obtained a certificate by the time that the new election register came into effect. There would be a sustained advertising campaign to inform such people of the need to have one of the documents available when they go to the polling station.

On the other hand, if the lady had got married only a short while before the time when the register came into effect, she would certainly have in her possession one or more documents in her maiden name. The advertising campaign would have alerted her to the need to hang onto those until she got a marriage certificate in her new name. In practice, there is not likely to be a problem. We bore in mind the points made by the hon. Member for Antrim, North when coming to our conclusions.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the certificates are Government documents and are issued to the minister of religion by the registrar general? They are exactly the same as the certificates that he issues.

Mr. Scott: But they are not completed by the Government and formally issued by them. The documents are issued by the minister of religion and, therefore, they are outside the ground rules that we set for ourselves in deciding what documents to use.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Can the hon. Gentleman help by explaining the purpose of the reference to the fifth document? If the lady's name on the register is her maiden name, no query will arise about her identity. If she is asked to give her name and state whether that is a true statement, she will be entitled to identify herself as the person on the register. What service do the marriage lines perform?

Mr. Scott: If the lady has changed her name, the marriage certificate is clear proof that she has been through the marriage service, and her new name will be on that certificate. This is a Committee point. We can discuss these matters and decide what the list should be. However, it seems sensible that there should be such a provision for a woman who changes her name in the period between the qualifying date and the publication of the register.

A number of doubts have been raised about the evidence of personation. I was flabbergasted to hear the reported comments of the electoral officer in Belfast. They certainly do not accord with our experience or with that of the constitutional parties in Northern Ireland over the past three or four years. We have no doubt that from the time of the 1981 by-elections in Fermanagh and South Tyrone, which occurred at the time of Republican hunger strikes, widespread electoral malpractice has been deliberately and systematically employed at elections in Northern Ireland by those who are not prepared to leave their electoral prospects to the whim of the electorate.

The Government have received representations from all the constitutional parties, which are gravely alarmed at the undermining of the democratic process which that malpractice has involved. The Government received a number of representations from the political parties, especially after the general election in June 1983, when the most sustained and deliberate effort was made to subvert the electoral system. From a number of press reports and discussions with those involved in elections, the consensus seemed to be that about 20,000 votes were stolen in Northern Ireland at that general election. That figure was very much in line with the private estimate that the Government had made.

Mr. McCusker: But does not the hon. Gentleman accept that the systematic stealing of votes was confined to about one third of the constituencies in Northern Ireland? Indeed, the main problem was probably confined to only two or three constituencies.

Mr. Scott: That may be true, but I cannot see us applying these necessary proposals to counter personation to a smaller unit than the political entity of Northern Ireland. I see no case for extending them more widely. I accept that the problem tends to be concentrated in certain areas. One would be surprised if it were otherwise.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said earlier, it is impossible to put an accurate figure on the level of electoral abuse or on personation—or plugging, as it is known in Northern Ireland. However, the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) said that the assessments that had been made were generally accepted figures, and that level of abuse cannot be tolerated. Reasonable steps, such as those that the Government are putting to the House, must be taken before the next Province-wide elections to reduce the opportunity for vote-stealing.

The Government have been accused of hastily preparing and rushing through the Bill. That cannot be sustained. It was on St. George's day 1982 that my right hon. Friend the Member for Waveney wrote to the parties in Northern Ireland expressing our concern about the extent of electoral malpractice which we were told was going on, and giving an idea of what the Government had in mind. Since then, we have had a constant dialogue with the different parties in Northern Ireland. My right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State and I informed the House of the broad lines upon which the Government were thinking. We did not expect everyone to agree with every proposal, but there was every opportunity for the parties to make such representations as they wished as they saw the Government's ideas developing.

Over the past two and a half years it was right to consider very carefully what further measures, including those requiring a Bill, should be introduced before the local government elections in May 1985. We were urged by some quarters to take such measures before the European Assembly elections this year. Indeed, until the last few days I understood that the Ulster Unionist party was in favour of action to reduce the scope for personation. The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley will recall that in September 1981 he wrote drawing attention to what he called widespread electoral malpractice in the Fermanagh and South Tyrone byelections. He also wrote to the Attorney-General expressing his concern.

At this time last year, the Ulster Unionist party was in touch, and made three approaches to the Government urging that there was a need to introduce some form of identification prior to a ballot paper being issued to a voter. The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) is also on record as calling for some form of identification to deal with personation. Thus, we can at least agree that there is no disagreement between us about the end that we should have in mind. The disagreement is limited to the practical means by which we can bring it about within the timescale that we face in meeting the local government elections in May 1985.

The right hon. Member for South Down predictably and forcefully made the point that the Bill should be applied throughout the United Kingdom, if it is to be applied anywhere. But there is no evidence of widespread electoral abuse at the moment in Great Britain, although we listened carefully to what my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) said. Obviously, the Home Secretary will listen to any such representations, but no real representations have been received by the Home Office to suggest that electoral abuse is widespread in Great Britain. Indeed, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, the number of tendered ballot papers and arrests for electoral malpractice on this side of the water is so small that the Home Office does not even keep the statistics centrally.

Mr. Peter Robinson: There is no evidence of widespread electoral abuse in half of the constituencies in Northern Ireland so why apply the legislation to them?

Mr. Scott: With great respect, I pointed out earlier that there is widespread electoral abuse in Northern Ireland and we cannot apply the legislation to an area smaller than the political entity of Northern Ireland. That should be common ground between us all.

Mr. Bruinvels rose——

Mr. Scott: Of course I regret the need for another difference between the electoral law on this side of the water and that in Northern Ireland, but let us not pretend that in other respects the electoral law in Northern Ireland is exactly the same as that which obtains in Great Britain. There are several very substantial differences, many of which were introduced by Northern Ireland Governments before direct rule. So there are differences, and it is accepted that there should be between the two systems.

However, the House must decide which is the lesser of two evils: to have another difference between the electoral system in Northern Ireland and that which obtains here, or to allow the democratic process to be undermined by those who seek to poison and destroy it. I have no doubt about what decision I would ask the House to make. The right hon. Member for South Down made another point that is, in a sense, included in the amendment. It is suggested that the whole burden of responsibility should be placed on the shoulders of the presiding officers by giving them greater discretion to deal with these matters. Presiding officers are temporary, voluntary officials drawn from the general public. We should not ask them to become involved in the inter-party contest. It would not be right for them to be given general discretionary powers of disfranchisement. Presiding officers would not welcome being given such powers. The parties must protect their candidates' interests and the RUC, which now has powers to intervene, must be able to take action against a personator. It would not be right, fair or proper to put that extra burden on presiding officers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) talked about multiple registration. That is not permitted in Northern Ireland for local and Northern Ireland Assembly elections. The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West referred to police powers. Before the next election, as before any election in Northern Ireland, there will be the closest consultation between the chief electoral officer and the RUC chief constable. The police are aware that the police being involved in the electoral process is a sensitive matter. I am sure that they will behave with sensitivity. We shall monitor what happens and remain in close touch. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was right to raise the matter.

Hon. Members mentioned the extra polling booths to be provided. The judgment about the extra money required was taken after the closest consultation with the chief electoral officer. He said that extra help was needed on that front.

I do not have a closed mind on polling hours. If hon. Members believe that polling stations should stay open an extra hour or two because of the provisions to prevent personation we shall take their opinion into account before coming to a final view. To ensure that electors in Northern Ireland are fully aware of the need to produce certain documents at the polling station, a sustained advertising campaign will be launched.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) asked about tendered ballot papers for those not on the register. That should not arise and we shall draw the attention of presiding officers to his view. If a person is not on the register he certainly is not entitled to vote, either with a proper ballot paper or a tendered ballot paper.

I was asked whether a document issued by a foreign country should be accepted. The franchise for this Parliament extends to citizens of the Republic of Ireland. I see no reason why a passport issued by the Republic of Ireland should not be included.

My hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) asked why the offence of having documents for the purpose of personation should be restricted to polling day. The reason is practical. Polling day is the day on which those who wish to subvert the democratic process would collect their documents. If they were caught with them on that day it would be easier to prove that they had them for the purpose of personation.

The Bill represents a departure from the traditional British way of holding elections. I regret the need to introduce it, but that has to be balanced against our determination to reduce the opportunities for personation. The Bill will be widely supported in Northern Ireland by those who have studied what has happened. I commend the Bill to the House and urge hon. Members not to vote for the reasoned amendment.

Dr. Alan Clift

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

10.23 pm

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): One of the basic tenets of British justice is that every convicted and discredited man is entitled to a fair hearing, and if new evidence emerges, he has a further entitlement to a new hearing. It is on those grounds that the case of Dr. Alan Clift should be raised in the House.

The main grounds for concern are that some eminent forensic scientists are claiming that Dr. Clift has been wrongly discredited, both by the judge and by the Home Office, that he was a victim of malice, and that the Home Office failed to carry out proper procedures and so denied Dr. Clift elementary justice. Important information on those issues has been provided by the scientists themselves, and through investigative journalism by Tim Crook of Independent Radio News.

This issue is naturally of great importance to Dr. Clift, and the rights of individuals always concern this House. In addition, Dr. Clift's story has wider implications. The controversy surrounding him reflects the conflicts that undoubtedly exist about the role of the expert in the legal process. Those conflicts must be resolved if we are to have a healthy legal system. First, however, the truth of what happened to Dr. Clift has to be established—and that can only be done by an independent inquiry investigating the full circumstances.

I am asked why I am now taking sides with Dr. Clift after being critical of his work and pressing vigorously for a review of all the cases with which he dealt. My answer —and I emphasise this—is that I am not taking sides with Dr. Clift, but I believe that it would be unfair and grossly unjust completely to accept the public discrediting of a leading Home Office forensic expert now that there is such a weight of distinguished dissent against it. I believe that Dr. Clift ought to have an opportunity to clear his name, that we are all entitled to the truth, and that the only proper recourse is to an independent inquiry.

The independent inquiry should look at four separate areas of concern.

The first is the validity of Dr. Clift's public discrediting by Lord Justice-General Emslie in Scotland, hearing the John Preece appeal. I wish to make it clear that I am in no way suggesting that John Preece was wrongly cleared. The obvious weakness of the case against him was shown by the fact that the prosecution did not proceed with its case at the original English magistrates hearing. He was extremely unfortunate that his case was subsequently pursued in Scotland, where a jury majority of nine to six is sufficient for a conviction. Whether John Preece's justified release should be so dependent on the discrediting of Dr. Clift is a different and more controversial issue. Lord Justice-General Emslie condemned Dr. Clift as a witness whose accuracy, fairness and objectivity could not be relied upon. He did so on two grounds.

First, Dr. Clift had been categorical at the trial that the man who had intercourse with Helen Wills before her murder was a group A secretor. The judge noted that two of the experts giving evidence for the Crown at the appeal disagreed with the theory that led Dr. Clift to this conclusion and, to use the judge's words, they made it clear that the two propositions on which it depended had no "scientific validity." However learned a judge may be, he has to rely on other experts if he wants to criticise an expert, and so it was in this case. Amazingly, Professor Kind, one of the two experts cited, is now saying:

"The judge got it wrong".

"He did not understand."

Dr. Kind claims that he did not condemn Dr. Clift as was suggested and that there is public evidence to support Dr. Clift's theory. The other witness, Professor Hennigson, claims that in his evidence to the appeal court he said that although Dr. Clift's conclusion was not absolute or irrefutable there was some evidence for it. That is a very different matter from its having no scientific validity.

Those important statements by people involved cast doubts upon the validity of the condemnation of Dr. Clift by Lord Justice-General Emslie, who for his summing-up relied on his own notes. The doubt should easily be resolved by the study of the transcript of the hearing. But incredibly that cannot be done because there is no transcript. There are only shorthand notes of this appeal. The Solicitor-General for Scotland, to his everlasting shame, said to me today that he has refused to provide a transcript because he is "not persuaded" that the £1,000 cost is justified. Is that not a shocking, disgraceful statement? So much for the price of justice in Britain today.

The judge also condemned Dr. Clift because all the experts agreed that he should have disclosed the fact that Helen Wills was herself a blood group A secretor. Dr. Clift had not done so. The judge suggested that this failure on Dr. Clift's part made it impossible for the defence to discover the blood group and that Dr. Clift was trying to minimise the risk of his opinions being challenged.

Now, startling evidence has emerged. The forensic expert who advised the defence at the original trial says that he was aware that Helen Wills and John Preece were almost certainly both group A secretors. He adds that he was surprised that defence counsel did not ask him to give evidence about this point, on which he was well qualified. Had this been done, he would routinely have checked it with Dr. Clift. So Dr. Clift did not make it impossible for the defence to discover crucial information, as the judge alleged. If Helen Wills' blood group was so crucial that Dr. Clift was discredited for not disclosing it, what blame can be attached to the defence for failing to probe this matter at the original trial?

For his part, Dr. Clift claims that after mentioning the murdered woman's blood group in his first report, which he believed would be available for the defence, he omitted it from the second one for the Scottish court on the advice of the prosecuting counsel. An independent inquiry would look into the reason and responsibility for this omission. The undeniable fact in this confused area is that defence counsel at the original trial did not regard the blood grouping as important because as many as 30 per cent. of the population share the same blood group. Dr. Clift's superior, Dr. Curry, also felt that it was not relevant; yet it was this issue that discredited Dr. Clift. Only an independent inquiry can determine whether or not it should have done so.

The second reason for an independent inquiry, and another area for concern, is the internal Home Office report of six of Dr. Clift's cases. This report was the essence of the case against him which led him to his enforced early retirement.

Dr. Clift asked a number of distinguished scientists to evaluate this report. They included a director of a forensic establishment, and a past president of the Forensic Science Society. I have read their comments, and they are very impressive. The overall conclusion of all these 11 experts was that Miss Pereira's report deserved more criticism than did Dr. Clift's work. There were some points of criticism of Dr. Clift, but not one of the experts supported the basic condemnation of Dr. Clift's professional integrity.

Typical comments were:

"It is perfectly evident that he (Dr. Clift) has received less than justice",

"Opinionated criticism of Dr. Clift's work, being concerned only with trivia", Nothing that lies outside the boundary of professional comment and judgment"

and

"The report has not shown the impartiality it rightly advocates."

Despite those comments, Dr. Clift was forced to retire by the Home Office. It should be borne in mind that the experts were invited by Dr. Clift to comment on the cases. Nevertheless, they are respectable scientists of integrity. Did the Home Office have undisclosed evidence, or did it simply ride rough-shod over the combined views of these experts? It is highly unsatisfactory for a controversial figure to be forcibly retired, apparently on evidence that has been so effectively questioned. The other side of the affair, if there is one, must be revealed and evaluated. The House, and concerned forensic scientists, have a right to know.

The third area of concern it that is has been alleged that Dr. Clift was the victim of malice. That is a serious charge of which the Minister is no doubt aware, and it must be examined. Dr. Clift worked for the forensic science service from 1953. He was promoted and, as far as is known, he had no adverse annual reports. At the end of July 1977, a new quality control officer arrived at Birmingham where Dr. Clift was working. By 5 September, the new arrival had produced about 15 cases on which to question Dr. Clift. Three days later, on 8 September, Dr. Clift was publicly suspended and his work referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions. The Home Office has said that, "once it became clear" that his work was not of a professionally competent standard, he could not continue as an expert witness. No one can criticise that statement. But how did it take only three days, after 24 years of unblemished service, for professional incompetence to become clear? It was obvious that the publicity involved would finish his public career. It was a sudden and unexpected downfall. Was it justified? The truth is that we simply do not know.

One year later, in October 1978, Dr. Clift was completely cleared by the Director of Public Prosecutions, and Dr. Clift's solicitor claims that the Home Office was told that there was no question of criminal proceedings against Dr. Clift. During this time, Dr. Clift's solicitor alleges that there was a whispering campaign against him, and his waste-paper basket was searched to see whether there were any damaging notes. These allegations should be scrutinised, not by the Home Office, which is directly involved, but by an independent inquiry.

The fourth reason and area of concern is the way in which the Home Office disciplinary procedures were apparently used. There were no informal warnings, no formal warnings, no known adverse annual reports, no chance to improve performance, and documents requested by Dr. Clift's solicitors were refused. Perhaps the Home Office believed that his unusual sequence of events was justified by the unusual nature of the case, but that cannot justify the Home Office being the prosecution, judge and jury, all in secret.

I appreciate that my request for an independent inquiry will not be welcomed by the Home Office. Possibly, there are fears by some officials that it may open a Pandora's box. But the Minister has a clear duty to the House of Commons, as well as to his Department.

I hope that the Minister will not hide behind the tired establishment formula that proper authority has already decided. If he claims that the judge should not be open to criticism, and that a retirement board has considered all the facts, and nothing further should be done, he will be failing to answer the case I have made. By reading a facile brief, he would be insulting the House of Commons. I hope that, if he is unable to agree to the independent inquiry now, he will undertake to go back to the Home Office, carefully consider the case that I have presented and let me have a fully considered reply in due course.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Mellor): This is a matter of considerable public interest, and I am glad to see other hon. Members in the Chamber, including my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), who I know has an interest in at least one of the cases that has been considered by the Court of Appeal recently. I must confess to some surprise at the case which the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent (Mr. Ashley) now puts forward for an independent inquiry into the case of Dr. Clift. He has been pressing for such an inquiry for some time, but his grounds for doing so have changed dramatically. Earlier this year, in seeking a debate under Standing Order No. 10, on the Parliamentary Commissioner's report into the Preece case, the right hon. Gentleman referred to the negative response by the Home Office to the discovery. He said:

"that one of its leading forensic scientists was professionally incompetent, made unjustified conclusions and gave meaningless evidence." — [Official Report, 26 January 1984; Vol. 52, c. 1069.]

Now the right hon. Gentleman has changed his tune. he says that he is not taking sides, that he is not sure whether Dr. Clift has been done an injustice by the Home Office. He now wants an independent inquiry to help him make up his mind about these matters. What a change from the right hon. Gentleman's earlier views about Dr. Clift which I have quoted. The right hon. Gentleman is trying to have it both ways. I cannot pretend to find that at all creditable.

In answering the call for an independent inquiry, it is important to set out some of the background to this affair which, though familiar to the right hon. Gentleman, may not be so well known to the wider audience interested in this debate.

After a long career in the forensic science service Dr. Clift moved to Birmingham forensic science laboratory in June 1976 to take charge of the biology department. In 1977, as a part of new quality controls introduced by the then controller of the forensic science service, an assistant director was appointed to the Birmingham laboratory. His job was to monitor the performance of scientists at the laboratory by various detailed checks of tests, files and reports. In the course of his examination of one of Dr. Clift's cases he found errors which he drew to Dr. Clift's attention. These errors were corrected, but other cases of Dr. Clift's were also found on examination to be unsatisfactory. These findings were reported to the director of the laboratory and by him to the controller of the service on 1 September 1977.

On the basis of these findings, the controller reported within the Home Office that there was substantial prima facie evidence that Dr. Clift had selected results in writing his reports, had reported results that were clearly wrong and had been guilty of grave technical incompetence. Following discussion of these findings with representatives from the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions, Dr. Clift was suspended from duty on full pay on 9 September 1977 pending a police inquiry on behalf of the DPP into his Birmingham cases. Early in the course of his investigation, the police officer reported areas where Dr. Clift had failed to maintain the standards expected of him as a scientist. However, the DPP decided on the basis of the officer's final report in 1978 that there had been no criminal intent and that Dr. Clift should not therefore be prosecuted. However, for the avoidance of doubt that is not the same as saying that Dr. Clift should be treated as a fully competent forensic scientist.

The police officer was assisted in his inquiry by Miss Pereira, an experienced biologist. Miss Pereira was then director of the Aldermaston forensic science laboratory. She is now controller of the forensic science service. She had the thankless task of investigating the conduct of a colleague, and she came to the conclusion, after a careful and painstaking inquiry, that Dr. Clift's conduct in a number of cases was not acceptable, and fell below the standards to be expected of an expert witness. She reported those conclusions honestly and fairly, giving examples of poor quality work such as conclusions based on flimsy evidence, failure to disclose full facts, risky decisions, unsound and invalid conclusions, ambiguous reports and other indications of incompetence. Miss Pereira had no axe to grind against Dr. Clift, and was concerned only for the standards of the forensic science service. Her conclusions have subsequently been criticised by Dr. Clift and his supporters. I want to place it on record that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and I have the fullest confidence in Miss Pereira's professional judgment and integrity, and have no reason to doubt that the conclusions she reached were the right ones.

Following Dr. Clift's suspension from duty in September 1977, three convicted prisoners petitioned the Home Office to re-open their cases. Two of these cases were referred to the Court of Appeal, which quashed the conviction of one of the two prisoners along with those of two other men convicted with him of robbery and burglary mainly on the evidence given by Dr. Clift.

Mr. Ashley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Mellor: No. There is not sufficient time.

The setting aside of these convictions, among other things, was used by solicitors in support of an application to the Secretary of State for Scotland to refer the case of

[Mr. Mellor]

Mr. John Preece for review by the High Court. Eventually on 17 February 1981, the case was referred to the High Court of Justiciary in Scotland.

The decision of the High Court, allowing the appeal and quashing the conviction, was delivered by the Lord Justice-General on 19 June 1981. The court dealt very fully with the question of the serological evidence given at the original trial and heard expert evidence from a number of outstanding forensic scientists; perhaps, it was suggested, the most impressive body of such experts ever assembled in one court. After considering that evidence the judge concluded that

"Dr. Clift was, in relation to the evidence which he gave at the trial of the secretor status of the semen in the mixed stains, discredited as a scientist."

Furthermore,

"that his testimony upon this very important chapter of the case fell far below the standards . . . normally to be expected and normally displayed by such a witness."

Finally,

"that no reasonable jury would have convicted once it had become clear upon a consideration of the serological chapter of his evidence that Dr. Clift was discredited not only as a scientist but as a witness upon the accuracy, fairness and objectivity of whose evidence reliance could be placed."

On 26 January, in reply to a question from the right hon. Member, my right hon. and learned Friend announced the results of the review of cases in which Dr. Clift gave evidence and his decision that it would be right for him to refer 16 of them to the Court of Appeal under section 17(1)(a) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968. The basis upon which that decision had been taken was made perfectly clear. The cases were those in which, if the evidence given by Dr. Clift at trial was erroneous or false — and my right hon. and learned Friend made no assumption on that point — the convictions might reasonably have been regarded as open to question. It was accepted at the time that the individual cases might in themselves have not warranted reference to the Court of Appeal, and that Dr. Clift's evidence was by no means the only evidence against all the accused persons, but it was felt right that they should have the benefit of any doubt about their convictions and that the Court of Appeal should be asked for its independent and authoritative determination in each case.

Three of the convicted persons indicated that they did not want their cases to be referred and their wishes in the matter have been respected. Efforts to trace two other defendants are continuing. In three of the 11 cases referred to the Court of Appeal earlier this year the appeals were subsequently abandoned by the individuals concerned.

Mr. Ashley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mellor: I shall not give way to the right hon. Gentleman. He exceeded his time.

Mr. Ashley: This is a shocking speech.

Mr. Mellor: Of the remaining eight cases, there were three in which the Court of Appeal quashed the convictions and five in which it dismissed the appeals. In none of the cases referred to the Court of Appeal has the court questioned the earlier conclusions reached about Dr. Clift's competence.

I now come to Dr. Clift's compulsory early retirement. In his case the normal procedures for civil servants—which take some considerable time to complete—could not be used because his professional weaknesses, when they came to light, discredited him as an expert witness able to give evidence to courts. This is the chief function of a forensic scientist. It was not possible for him to continue in his existing work and there was no other work in the Home Office to which he could be transferred. As I have said, his weaknesses came to light as soon as revised quality assurance arrangements were introduced. The weaknesses had not been suspected previously because it had been assumed that an officer of his standing would be scientifically competent and that it was unnecessary to check the integrity of his work.

Although the retirement procedure used in Clift's case was unusual, it was inevitable because the normal procedure was impracticable. It was agreed between the Department and the Institution of Professional Civil Servants, the union representing Dr. Clift, that six specimen cases would be examined in detail to show the Department's objections to Dr. Clift's work, that he would offer his defence and, if this was not accepted, a retirement board would be asked to consider the case for his early retirement.

That procedure was followed. Dr. Clift was given access to all papers, records and statements relevant to the cases under review. The board, consisting of two assistant secretaries who had had no contact with Dr. Clift and two scientists not employed by the Home Office, considered these six cases and concluded that his work was seriously inadequate and unanimously recommended his early retirement. Dr. Clift and his solicitor were given every opportunity to put their case to the board and were invited to appear before it, but they did not accept this invitation. Dr. Clift then appealed to the Civil Service Appeal Board against his retirement. In an unusually long hearing, the board reviewed the procedures that had been used, the case against Dr. Clift and the Department's decision and concluded that the Home Office had acted fairly and that Dr. Clift had not been unfairly dismissed.

Dr. Clift therefore had ample opportunity to present his case against compulsory retirement. Nothing that has happened since then has led the Home Office to conclude that its decision was wrong, or unfair to Dr. Clift. His conduct was carefully examined before he was retired. In all the subsequent proceedings which have flowed from the Clift affair none of the responsible bodies concerned —the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, the Civil Service Appeal Board, the Court of Appeal— has questioned the conclusion reached about Dr. Clift's competence. It is true that Dr. Clift and some of his friends have mounted a campaign to vindicate him, but no new evidence has been produced, and indeed much of what has been said tends only to confirm the correctness of the decision that Dr. Clift was not acceptable as an expert witness. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has lately lent his name to that campaign. He seems to think that he can act as counsel for the prosecution and the defence in the same case. I and many others do not find that a particularly edifying spectacle.

To sum up, my argument comes to this. In 1981 the High Court of the Judiciary in Scotland delivered a broadside against Dr. Clift of almost unprecedented ferocity. It amounted not merely to a denunciation of his competence in that case, but called into question his standing as a reliable witness in any case.

Faced with that, it has always seemed to me and to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary that it was necessary to trawl through those cases of which details were available and where the issue of guilt was contested. As a result, 129 cases were examined in detail and as we know 16 were identified as ones which should be referred to the Court of Appeal.

Those were cases where, in the opinion of my right hon. and learned Friend, the evidence of Dr. Clift was of sufficient materiality that if the evidence was unsound, the conviction might reasonably be regarded as open to question.

That is not to say that we felt that all the convictions were unsafe and unsatisfactory. That is not our job. It is the job of the courts to deal with these matters openly and publicly. It was for us to identify those cases where there was reasonable unease—that is precisely what we did. In deciding to refer those cases my right hon. and learned Friend sought to give the benefit of any doubt to the convicted person. I should make it clear that it has come as no surprise to me that in a majority of them the Court of Appeal has felt that the convictions were perfectly safe, or the appellants have abandoned their appeals.

But we should have been much criticised had we failed to expose to open view those cases where a contrary view was genuinely possible even if not probable. That is what we have done. It has been a painful exercise for all of us at the Home Office and particularly in the Forensic Science Service. But I am convinced that what we have done in the wake of the Preece decision was both wholly necessary and quite right. These matters have been fully ventilated and appropriate procedures have been followed, as I hope I have demonstrated to the satisfaction of the House tonight.

Orders of the Day

Friendly Societies Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.35 am

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Government were advised in May this year that there were significant doubts about whether a number of friendly society contracts were enforceable at law. At the end of May I therefore announced that we would introduce legislation to protect the position of those who had entered into those contracts in good faith. The legislation would also prevent such doubts arising on future contracts, broadly by restoring the law to what it was previously understood to be.

The legal doubts concern the enforceability of some 300,000 life insurance contracts taken out before 1 June 1984 with certain recently formed friendly societies. The main problem was that the brochures advertising the contracts purported to confer benefits that were almost certainly greater than the statutory limits on tax-exempt contracts, and different in their nature from the types of contract admitted by the rules of the societies concerned. Doubts have also arisen about the way in which the limits should be applied in the case of assurance contracts in which the benefit was linked to investments, and about whether the surrender value of an annuity should be counted against the limit on gross sums. Those doubts apply to friendly societies generally and to the limits on taxable as well as tax-exempt business.

I shall refer to the material clauses of the Bill. Clause 1 deals with the particular problem that arose in respect of 11 societies registered since 1966. It removes doubts about enforceability of past contracts issued by those societies on account of additional terms being imported into the contracts by the way in which the contracts were advertised. The clause enables such additional terms to be disregarded in determining compliance with the statutory limits on friendly societies' tax-exempt life insurance business and in determining the validity of any contract to which the clause applies.

Clause 2 deals with a lesser problem identified for societies generally and redefines the provisions for the future so that the same problems will not recur. It does so by modifying the operation of the limits on an individual's entitlement to tax-exempt benefits from registered friendly societies. Increases in the value of a contract due to investment linking are to be disregarded for the purpose of the limits, in the same way as declared bonuses on with-profit policies are already disregarded. It ties the limits to the sums assured, thus avoiding the need to take account of surrender values. It applies those modifications with retrospective effect, thus removing doubts about existing contracts on both those counts. By abolishing the limits on taxable business, clause 2 also removes doubts about possible breaches of those limits in the past on similar grounds.

Most of the provisions that I announced in May will be in next year's Finance Bill. However, it was important to resolve the legal position without delay. The Government were therefore anxious to introduce the legislation as soon as possible in the Session. The Bill includes only those provisions that could have no place in a Finance Bill, primarily the validation of the existing contracts. The Bill is mainly technical. It is entirely helpful to friendly societies and their members. I therefore commend it to the House.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): The Bill applies to friendly societies, 4,000 of which were in existence long before 1966. Most are very small, set up during the past 100 years, and some have a longer history. They were working-class, self-help organisations. About 50 undertake taxable business—a very small proportion of that total—and may have about 2 million members between them. Eleven post-1966 societies were set up to undertake a different sort of business. When the limits on tax exempt business were increased in the Finance Act 1980, some friendly societies regarded it as an encouragement to do such business—societies were set up specifically to deal with such insurance policies. When the Government decided to change those limits in this year's Finance Bill, the activities of friendly societies attracted the attention of lawyers. They examined promotional literature and the policies that societies were issuing, and doubts about the validity of some policies arose. That is bound to happen when lawyers closely examine one's activities. No doubt they found uncertainties partly because of the rules of friendly societies.

As the Minister said, the Bill is welcomed by the friendly societies. I took the trouble to contact the National Conference of Friendly Societies to ensure that it was welcomed and that no further questions needed to be raised. The Bill will indeed settle uncertainty and doubt about some policies. A few of the doubts have been dealt with neatly as clause 1 simply excludes promotional literature from counting as part of the contract. Perhaps the same principle could be applied elsewhere.

I have only one point to make—I wish that the Government were prepared to deal with other issues concerning people's money and savings to exclude doubt and uncertainty and to remove the possibility of people losing their savings. I think, for example, of licensed dealers who are now allowed to sell shares over the counter. Shareholders have found that their shares have disappeared and that they have no recompense. The Government's energy and industry in bringing forward the Bill is to be commended. I only wish that they showed the same energy and industry in regard to dealing with abuse and uncertainty in money dealings that affect small investors and savers.

9.42 am

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): I support what my hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) have said and I have no criticisms of the Bill. It is clear that political battle is not about to be joined. My hon. Friend said that we shall return to this matter in the next Finance Bill. Although the Bill, which deals with only a small part of friendly societies' activities, is to be commended, there is a case for my hon. Friend to consider the traditional role of friendly societies, especially in cities where there is a long tradition of a combination of skill and working people. That applies to Portsmouth, although it is in the bustling and relatively prosperous south, as much as to northern cities.

The pre-1966 societies have never engaged in the type of activities that the Bill covers. They have never regarded themselves as being in competition with insurance companies or in the provision of mortgages. They have always emphasised their philanthropic role and their aim of mutual self-help.

There are 2 million members of the pre-1966 societies —including 35 of the main societies—and none of them has ever engaged in activities that could be regarded as damaging to the Revenue. They have not sought tax avoidance or to skate on the edge of the law. Will my hon. Friend consider amending friendly societies legislation to ensure that pre-1966 societies carry on their traditional philanthropic role while the newer ones are regarded as what they are—insurance companies? They are not true friendly societies. I do not wish to labour the point but it is important that, when drawing up legislation such as this —which I am happy to support—we recognise the important social purpose that has been fulfilled for many decades by the traditional friendly societies. We should do nothing to weaken their role, nor should we tar them with the same brush as others whose purpose and activities are quite different.

Mr. Ian Stewart: With the leave of the House, I should like to answer some of the questions that have been asked.

With regard to licensed dealers and securities, I hope that the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) will wait for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry's White Paper on financial services which will cover many issues relating to investor protection. I am grateful for her welcome for the Bill. The same is true of my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths). I shall consider what he said. I should like to add my own words of approval and support for the traditional friendly societies. The boundary between the pre-1966 friendly societies and later ones is not quite as clear cut as he suggested. Some of the Bill's provisions will also assist traditional friendly societies because of doubts about the application of the limits on investment linking—a problem met by all societies.

What I said about the Finance Bill 1985 was mentioned in my statement of 31 May. My comments are consequential on decisions in the Bill. They go no wider. I listened to my hon. Friend's comments with interest and shall consider what he said.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House. —[Mr. Donald Thompson.]

Mineral Workings Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.48 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Neil Macfarlane): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill concerns two issues relating to former mineral workings. Its main purpose — and all but one of its clauses relate to this — is to wind up the ironstone restoration fund now that there is so little remaining ironstone working in England. The second purpose, with which clause 7 deals, enables local authorities to get on to land quickly to take remedial action when they have reason to believe that there is a risk of subsidence because of former underground mineral workings.

The problem with the ironstone restoration fund is that, although its income has dried up with the marked reduction in ironstone working, it is still required to finance agricultural aftercare and afforestation. After 30 years of useful life in which it has almost, but not quite, completed its task, the fund is able to meet its remaining financial obligations only with the help of substantial voluntary assistance from the British Steel Corporation.

The BSC is the only major operator still extracting ironstone in the United Kingdom, and for some years it has been the only operator contributing to the fund. It is already bearing the fund's financial burdens on an informal basis. The time has come to wind up the fund, to transfer such money as will be left to the BSC and to provide for the necessary future aftercare and afforestation.

The fund was set up under the Mineral Workings Act 1951 in response to increasing public anxiety about the dereliction of land in the east midlands ironstone field. The working of ironstone by opencast methods is not a 20th-century phenomenon, but has been going on for centuries. However, the dereliction was new. Until about 1914 ironstone working was confined mainly to the shallower seams of ore, which were cheap and easy to restore by back-filling as part of the extraction process. It was normal to restore the land as extraction progressed, and restoration was usually required by the terms of the operator's lease from the ironstone royalty owner. The pressure for production to meet the demands of the first world war changed that. Operators were driven to work deeper seams, restoration became less easy and more expensive and, inevitably, an increasing quantity of worked ironstone was left unrestored.

By 1950 about 2,500 acres of land were unrestored in Northamptonshire alone. The then Minister for Local Government and Planning, the late Mr. Hugh Dalton, described areas he visited as resembling "deserts of the moon . . . horrible to behold . . . and bound to have the most depressing effect upon the morale of all those living near them."

The then Government were faced with a serious problem. Their solution was to designate those areas that they considered most vulnerable as the "ironstone district" and to set up the ironstone restoration fund to fulfil three main functions: to meet the full cost of reclaiming the land; to facilitate the full restoration of future workings; and to assist owners and occupiers of restored land to return it to beneficial after-use for agriculture and forestry. Today the fund is administered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

The system of finance worked quite well during the years in which the British steel industry was buoyant, but over the years technical and economic developments have reduced the demand for locally dug ore. Contributions to the fund decreased as the rate of extraction fell. As a result the fund is teetering on the brink of bankruptcy. This year the generosity of BSC has come to the fore. It has voluntarily undertaken to pay nearly £400,000 over and above its required operator's levy to keep the fund afloat until 31 March 1985.

Without that contribution from the BSC the fund would be nearly £105,000 in the red. Expenditure in the region of £290,000 is estimated and the Exchequer would have to supplement the regular BSC contributions by a further £600,000 to keep the fund afloat until the end of the current PESC period, which is 31 March 1987.

The fund has done a good job, but it is now at the end of its useful life. The circumstances which gave it birth have been overtaken by events. The small, environmentally irresponsible operators have disappeared from the ironstone scene and have been replaced by a responsible nationalised industry. The pre-1950 dereliction has been restored, and most of the land worked since that date has been repaired and returned to beneficial after-use.

Some land is still being worked for the steel industry, but that is all either within the ownership of the BSC or under its control. All that remains is to complete the aftercare work on a handful of the most recently restored sites. I shall explain how we propose to deal with those in a moment. In short, we believe that the time has come to give the fund a decent burial, which is what the ironstone provisions of the Bill set out to do.

Clauses 1 to 3 and 6 contain provisions to wind up the fund, to transfer its assets to the BSC and to make general house-keeping arrangements to tidy up its final account.

The main meat is contained in clauses 4 and 5, which make arrangements in recognition of the fact that some owners and occupiers, whose land has already been restored with financial help from the fund, still have legitimate expectations from it in respect of the agricultural aftercare or afforestation of their land. I fear that at first sight those arrangements may appear a little arcane. That is because they are essentially transitional provisions and must therefore reflect the rather complicated aftercare arrangements contained in the 1951 Act.

Clause 4 is a transitional provision to honour arrangements which have been made to return land to agricultural use. Under section 20 of the 1951 Act, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food may enter into arrangements with the owners or occupiers of land which has received restoration payments from the fund to make grants for work to bring it "to a good state of cultivation and fertility."

His expenses in so doing may be defrayed out of the fund.

Most of the section 20 arrangements have already been completed but, as I mentioned earlier, there are still a handful of sites—about 16—on which some aftercare work has still to be done. The purpose of clause 4 is to enable my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to continue to honour those agreements for a transitional period and for his expenses to be met by the BSC.

All of the arrangements must be made before section 20 is repealed on 1 April 1985. Where they relate to the aftercare of land restored before 1 January 1984, the arrangements may persist until completion or until 31 March 1990, whichever is the earlier.

The cut-off date has been set at the end of March 1990 because that is five years from the introduction of the transitional arrangements, and because Parliament accepted that five years was a reasonable period for aftercare when it passed section 5 of the Minerals Act 1981. In fact, the reality of our arrangements is a little more generous because land restored by the end of 1983 could have the benefit of six and a quarter years' aftercare, and the statutory cut-off date will not apply to the one or two sites restored after 1983. The arrangements for those may persist for whatever period is specified in the formal agreement.

Clause 5 makes similar transitional arrangements for land which has been restored with the assistance of payments from the fund and is being returned to forestry. The afforestation arrangements are rather different from those made for agricultural aftercare but I am afraid just as arcane because of the 1951 provisions which they reflect.

Under section 25(1) of the 1951 Act, the forestry commissioners may pay a special grant at an agreed rate to assist with the return of worked ironstone land within the ironstone district to a condition suitable for afforestation. The grant does not form part of the normal forestry grant. The commissioners' expenses on that special grant are defrayed from the ironstone restoration fund. The provisions of clause 5 will oblige the BSC to reimburse the commissioners' expenses on that special grant until 31 March 1990, provided that it has been consulted about the rate of the grant.

It is important to recognise that the clause 5 arrangements relate only to the special grant which ironstone landowners and occupiers receive from the forestry commissioners. Their normal forestry grant under section 1 of the Forestry Act 1978 will in no way be disturbed by the transitional provisions of clause 5.

Those then are the ironstone provisions. They have been worked out in full consultation between officials of my Department, the BSC and the Ironstone Royalty Owners Association, which represents the interested landowners. Other Government Departments with an interest and local authorities in the ironstone district have also been consulted. In short, what is proposed is little more than a sensible regularisation of the informal position which, in essence, already exists. But the provisions are framed around the expectation that the fund can be wound up and the new arrangements put in its place in time for the BSC to assume its new responsibilities at the beginning of the next financial year.

The purpose of clause 7 is to give local authorities a power to enter land to survey, monitor or carry out reclamation works where subsidence has occurred or is likely to occur as a result of former underground mineral workings. Any proposal to introduce a new power to enter private land is a matter of obvious public importance and natural concern, and I should like to take time to explain to the House the background to it and why the Government consider the power is needed.

The widespread existence of old limestone workings in parts of the west midlands has been known for many years, but prior to 1978 it was generally thought that, if over time any underground collapse were to occur, it would have little effect on the surface. However, in that year subsidence over deep workings in Sandwell caused substantial damage to industrial buildings, serious enough to cause considerable concern about where else in the area other subsidence from old workings might be threatened. Accordingly, my Department along with the borough councils of Dudley, Sandwell and Walsall and the West Midlands county council commissioned Ove Arup and Partners to carry out a comprehensive study to determine the nature and scale of the problem.

The report was published in July last year. It identified a number of areas of limestone mining which were not suspected previously. It also highlighted the considerable degree of uncertainty regarding the precise extent and condition of many of the workings. I visited several of the worst affected sites and saw at first hand the problems which the authorities and the people of the region must face. I also met representatives of the financial institutions.

An action programme has been set up under the derelict land reclamation scheme with the aim of resolving the problem, and we have appointed an advisory panel, under the chairmanship of Sir Edward Parkes, to assist in this. The local authorities in the area are developing a programme of remedial work that will continue for some years. One of the first things identified as an essential need in the work was the importance of being able to gain access to sites that were found to be at risk, and to take prompt action. Many old mine workings lie below land that is privately owned, sometimes in multiple ownership, and I have no doubt that in most cases the consent of owners and occupiers to enter their land, to survey it and to carry out the remedial work will be freely given. It is obviously in their interests to do so.

However, there will almost certainly be cases—we have evidence of this already—where, through natural reluctance, or because of their absence, the consent of owners or occupiers will not be forthcoming within the necessary time. Delay would put not only their land, but their neighbours' land, at even greater risk. That is why the urgent action that may be required from time to time needs the backing of the new power. As the House will have noticed, the new application of the power is not confined to the west midlands. It will be available, and wisely used, where similar problems may arise. We are already aware of many other areas where there are such workings.

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): My hon. Friend says that the power will have a wider geographical application than just the west midlands. Will he make it clear that the Bill affects only those areas listed in schedule 1 and that, despite what clause 7(2) says about, he is talking only about previous ironstone operations, not about the underground mine workings?

"underground mining operations other than for coal",

Mr. Macfarlane: If my hon. Friend studies my earlier words, he will discover that clause 7 deals with a completely different problem. I am confining my remarks mostly to the problems of the west midlands, but they could occur elsewhere. I shall enlarge upon this matter in a few moments.

The context in which the new powers will be exercised is set out in subsections (1) to (4) of the clause. Hon. Members will note the strictly limited purposes described in subsection (3) for which the power of entry may be exercised. Subsection (2) defines "relevant operations" by reference to section 89(2) of the 1949 Act. For the immediate convenience of the House, I might mention that these are defined simply as underground mining operations, except coal mining, which have ceased to be carried out.

Subsections (5) to (9) provide fairly elaborate safeguards for the occupier of land to which entry is wanted. Subsection (10) provides a penalty for wilful obstruction. Subsections (11) and (12) contain the important provisions for compensation for loss, damage or disturbance. Subsection (13) is a standard provision for arbitration in case of disputes over compensation.

In speaking to the clause on Second Reading, I should bring two points to the attention of the House. Subsection (5) requires seven days' notice of intended entry to be given to an occupier. The occupier was chosen as being the man on the spot with whom a local authority could deal quickly, whereas, highly desirable though it may be, an owner who is not also the occupier may be difficult to trace, with risk of unwanted delay.

We now consider it essential, to safeguard the rights of owners, that they, too, should be notified. One way of overcoming the problem of the difficulty in tracing owners is to have recourse to the reserve power in subsection (7) for a justice of the peace to authorise entry by warrant if access to the owner cannot easily be obtained. Accordingly, I am happy to tell the House that I shall be tabling an amendment in Committee to secure the requirement that notice of intended entry must be given to the owner as well as to the occupier, with recourse to a justice of the peace in case of serious difficulty in tracing the owner or obtaining his consent.

The second point concerns subsection (3), which authorises entry for the purposes of survey or carrying out remedial works. A local authority's power to carry out remedial works lies in the general derelict land reclamation power of section 89(2) of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949. Subsection (3), however, does not permit works to be carried out under subsection (2) except with the consent of all persons interested in the land. So that, while the power to enter land without consent, if necessary, to survey it subsists in subsection (3)(b) and (c) of our clause, the same is not the case, as the text stands, in respect of the power to carry out remedial works without consent. The power of entry on to the land without consent for the purpose of doing works would not be of any practical use if the works could not be carried out because someone with an interest in the land had not given his consent.

Therefore, to make the provisions of the clause fully effective in respect of entry to carry out works, I am proposing to table an amendment to the Bill to override that constraint in urgent cases. I should emphasise that the intention would be to impose strict conditions on the exercise of the power to safeguard the position of owners.

10.5 am

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): I apologise to the Minister and to the House for the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), who should have been here today. He was abroad yesterday on parliamentary business, and I am afraid that he is one of the many thousands of people who are waiting to land at Heathrow airport this morning. His aeroplane is circling somewhere above us, and I am sure his thoughts are with us.

The Opposition take no exception to the Bill as it stands. We shall wish to make a few detailed points in Committee, but by and large we welcome the Bill. I thank the Minister for the clear way in which he explained it to the House.

10.6 am

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): The Bill will have important consequences for my constituency of Kettering in Northamptonshire, and I am grateful for the opportunity to speak during the Second Reading debate. To set the record straight, I assure my hon. Friend the Minister that my constituency no longer resembles the deserts of the moon. My hon. Friend referred to Dr. Hugh Dalton, whose initiative many years ago was important in setting up the ironstone restoration fund. It is appropriate, when one considers the subject of today's debate, that in some quarters of the Labour party he was called the iron Chancellor.

Ironstone working has now stopped in Northamptonshire. It reached its peak in about 1970 when iron ore was needed for the Corby steel works. With the sad closure of those works in 1980, no more iron ore was needed. Although working has ended, the affected landowners and occupiers have a continuing interest in the ironstone restoration fund and the provisions of the Bill for changing the finances for restoration work. It is important for the House to appreciate that there are two sorts of restoration for old ironstone workings. The first is where the old quarries are filled in; as my hon. Friend told the House, that work has largely finished in Northamptonshire. The second aspect of restoration is the aftercare, when the land is brought back into agricultural and forestry use. I am primarily concerned with the aftercare restoration.

Under the Mineral Workings Acts of 1951 and 1971, a tripartite system was set up to administer the ironstone restoration fund. Each of the three parties — the Government, the steel companies and the quarry owners —contributed to a fund to pay for the restoration of the quarries and the additional measures necessary to bring the land back into agricultural and forestry use.

I speak in part on behalf of the Ironstone Royalty Owners Association, which has a direct interest in the winding up of the fund proposed by the Bill. I should say at the outset that I broadly welcome the Bill and commend it to the House. The points that worry me can be dealt with in Committee, and I shall allude to them only briefly now. Before doing so, may I compliment my hon. Friend the Minister and his officials on the fair and open way in which they discussed with the landowners possible changes to the fund. It was much appreciated.

I also congratulate the British Steel Corporation on the expeditious and efficient way in which it restored almost 1,900 acres of open gullets in the Kettering and Corby areas during the past three years. I had practical experience last week of examining some of the restoration work done by the British Steel Corporation in the middle of my constituency, and that has been completed in an efficient manner. As this is only a Second Reading debate, I shall make only a few comments. In Committee, when we give the Bill further consideration, I shall be able to debate these points in more detail.

[Mr. Roger Freeman]

It is important to enshrine in the Bill the essential principle that any variation to arrangements affecting agricultural land agreed between my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and all the interested parties before 1 April 1985 — that date is acceptable to the landowners—shall be made only with the written approval of all the interested parties. As my hon. Friend the Minister knows, the Bill provides only that written approval should be obtained from the BSC. Clause 4(2) should include the need for the Minister to obtain also the written approval of the landowners and occupiers. It is important to retain the tripartite system on which the original fund was based.

The Bill is based on limiting the life of arrangements for aftercare of restored land where the basic work—filling in the holes—was completed by 1 January 1984, to a cut-off date of 1 April 1990. I can understand the desire of the Government and BSC to have a definite limitation to the period of financial commitment. That is logical, but I stress that subsidence after restoration work can occur beyond the five years from the completion of that work. What happens if there is subsidence after 1990?

I am sure that the Government will agree that such subsidence may occur. It is undeniable that, for geological reasons, it may do so. The Government's arguments may be that this subsidence may be minor and hence not many landowners will be affected, and that, in any case, if they are affected by subsidence after 1990, they can resort to the land drainage grant system. However, if the drainage grant system disappears, the landowners will be left without any financial support or recourse. I am asking only for an assurance by the Minister—not for any wholesale change in the Bill—and some comforting words that it is not intended to leave the landowners particularly vulnerable after 1990 should they suffer subsidence relating to the original restoration work.

One unknown factor that has not yet been encountered is the consequence of large-scale restoration work completed in a short time. We do not have a precedent, to establish whether and on what scale subsidence may occur.

I am also concerned about the procedure for determining forestry grants. The Bill proposes that the forestry commissioners shall decide on the rate of grants after consultation with the BSC, which ultimately will have to bear the cost. I am referring here to clause 5. I am unhappy that there is no provision in clause 5(1) for an annual review of such grants, which is surely both equitable and practicable, and is also the practice in present arrangements.

I am also concerned that there is no provision for the Forestry Commission to consult representatives of the landowners as defined in clause 4(1) of the Mineral Workings Act 1971. Is it not reasonable to ask that the Government should consult not only the ultimate payers of the grant — BSC — but also the recipients? The recipients of the grant have a legitimate right to be consulted as well.

I support the Bill, but I hope that the Minister will give us at least an assurance that he will review my points before we discuss them in detail in Committee. At that stage I hope not only to bring up these points but several other detailed points raised by the Northamptonshire county council, which has been in recent communication with me.

10.15 am

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): I had not intended to intervene, because I had no reason for doing so other than to give my support to the proposals for restoration in areas where there has been ironstone working, but my hon. Friend the Minister replied very sharply to what was a modest request for information, and one wonders why he should respond in quite such a manner if the answer to the question is not as I might have feared.

I shall confine my comments to clause 7. It is reasonable on Second Reading to ask just what is the extent of the Bill's operations and whether, within the confines of what is intended to be a fairly narrow measure for restoration in carefully defined geographical areas, there is a power which may be used by local authorities in other contexts to examine areas which have been used for the working of ironstone.

Clause 7 applies where a local authority has been given certain powers

"for the purpose of reclaiming or improving land"— in which

"relevant operations have been . . . carried out".

In subsection (2) "relevant operations" are defined, not as limestone workings, but as

"underground mining operations other than for coal."

That is a wide definition. If the geographical limitations are not specifically those set out in schedule 1, this may have enormously wide ramifications and would be an extension of the powers which local authorities already have to enter land. If that is intended, it should be spelt out clearly on Second Reading.

I press the point about geographical areas because, if I do not misquote my hon. Friend the Minister, both in his original comments and in his response to me he said that the clause would have a much wider operation than merely in the west midlands. Would it not be simple for my hon. Friend, in replying to the debate, and in response to a direct question, to say that it will apply to those areas listed in schedule 1? We shall then all know where we are, and those of us who have an interest in the powers of local authorities other than in the restoration of ironstone workings will not have our fears raised.

It is desirable, before we vote on Second Reading, to know that it is intended that the Bill will apply only to the geographical areas delineated in schedule 1, and that in so far as it applies to mining operations other than those for the mining of limestone it will be limited to such mining operations within those geographical areas.

Mr. Macfarlane: I thank the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) for taking the place of his hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), whom we hope will have a successful landing and will be returned to the House as quickly as possible. I know that the hon. Gentleman is most diligent. I understand the circumstances of his absence and I look forward to his participation in Committee.

I urge my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) to study what I said earlier. All the assurances and guarantees that he and I want are contained in the Bill. I have hinted that I shall have to draft amendments for Committee to ensure that those provisions are honoured.

The new application of the power is not confined to the west midlands. There could be other problems elsewhere. My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) asked what would happen if there were subsidence after 1990. There may be a longer-term problem, which the Government and local authorities will have to work together to overcome.

The current problem has been prompted by difficulties in the west midlands and no one should underestimate them. We have a responsibility to ensure that if such problems arise elsewhere we have the necessary powers and safeguards available to us. That is why I shall be tabling amendments.

Most provisions of the Bill apply only in the ironstone district, but clause 7 applies to the whole of England and Wales. I am convinced that we need the powers in that clause to ensure that problems do not arise again.

This is essentially a two-purpose Bill. The first and essential purpose is to wind up the ironstone restoration fund, and the second purpose is to empower local authorities to enter land for the purpose of surveying, monitoring and carrying out remedial work when they have reason to believe that there is a risk of serious subsidence because of instability caused by former underground mineral workings. The scene could be wider than the west midlands and we must be vigilant.

I am grateful for the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering. We are not poles apart on many of the points that he raised and I shall consider some of his suggestions. There is a system, involving my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, to ensure that grants can be made.

As for the tripartite arrangement on notification and discussion, I am the most malleable of Ministers on a Friday morning and I should like to consider what my hon. Friend said and come back to him in due course.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 42 (Committal of Bills).

10.23 am

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): When I applied for this debate, I knew of one or two cases of constituents who were aggrieved, but my researches in the past few days have disclosed that the unhappiness is much more widespread.

As most people know, residence in hospital under the NHS is provided free and no charge is made for accommodation or food, although those on pensions receive a reduced rate after a period of time. However, those who are well enough to leave hospital, but not well enough to live alone, are provided for by the state in social services residential accommodation administered by the local authority.

Local authorities provide such accommodation for elderly people and others under part III of the National Assistance Act 1948. Under section 22 of the Act, local authorities are required to fix a standard charge for their accommodation, the idea being that it should be the economic cost of providing that accommodation. If the resident cannot afford to pay the full charge, local authorities are required to assess his or her ability to pay and to charge accordingly.

However, the charge must not fall below a prescribed minimum rate—currently £27·25 per week, which will rise to £28·85 on 26 November. That amount is always equal to the standard rate of retirement pension, less a specified sum for personal requirements.

In assessing someone's ability to pay, the local authority is required by section 22(5) of the 1948 Act, as amended, to give effect to part III of schedule 1 to the Supplementary Benefits Act 1976, which is used in assessing eligibility for supplementary benefit. In fact, for supplementary benefit purposes, that has been replaced by new provisions in the Social Security Act 1980, but the earlier provisions have been saved for the purposes of charging for accommodation.

Paragraph 17 of schedule 1 to the 1980 Act provides:

"In taking account of the value to any person of an interest in the dwelling in which he resides, any sum which might be obtained by him by selling that interest, or borrowing money upon the security of that interest, shall be disregarded."

Under paragraph 20 of the schedule, £1,200 of capital is disregarded. Above that, a weekly income of 25p for each complete £50 is assumed. That assumes that an interest rate of 26 per cent. after tax—about 35 per cent. before tax — can be obtained. I cannot imagine where one could obtain such a rate of interest from a reliable source.

The problem is deciding when someone does not, in practice, reside in a house any longer. In 1978 the DHSS published a memorandum of guidance "Residential Homes Under Part III of the National Assistance Act 1948: Charging and Assessment Procedures", which is still current guidance. It says in paragraph 17:

"It is for local authorities to decide in the light of the circumstances of each case whether a person provided with residential accommodation has effectively given up residence in a dwelling in which he retains an interest and accordingly whether—and at what stage—the value of his interest in it should cease to be disregarded under paragraph 17 of Schedule 1 to the Supplementary Benefits Act 1976."

The memorandum goes on to say that once a property ceases to be considered the place in which the resident of the home resides, the value of his interest in the dwelling should be treated as capital. Normally, the only exception would be if a spouse or a child under 16 continued to live in the house. However, the memorandum says in paragraph 20:

"Local authorities have no power to compel a resident to sell his property so as to pay the assessed charge out of available resources. When a resident declines to sell, however, it is reasonable for the authority to suggest that a charge be placed on the property that would enable them to recover the accrued balance of the charges, including any interest at an agreed rate, when the property is finally sold (possibly after the resident's death). Residents should be advised or assisted to consult a solicitor about this procedure."

That means that local authorities can allow unpaid charges to accumulate and the debt to be recovered eventually from the estate.

Even then, a DHSS background note "Assessment of Ability to Pay: Capital Value of a Former Dwelling", issued in January 1984, says:

"In general, it is not the practice of authorities to enforce any outstanding debt against the personal representatives of the deceased when this would result in hardship through the sale of the property."

Relatives other than spouses or parents are not liable to maintain someone living in residential accommodation, although they may make a contribution and, in circumstances where the local authority is intending to recover the debt in due course from the estate of the resident, to do so would reduce the size of that debt.

The January 1984 background note points out that there is "no compulsion on an authority to take into account the value of a former dwelling; in addition to the circumstances in which they should not do so (e.g. because of a resident's liability to maintain a spouse (or a child) they have discretion to ignore or discount such capital assets."

During the Standing Committee debate on the Health and Social Services and Social Security Adjudications Bill, my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health explained the circumstances in which that discretion should be used as follows:

"People in residential accommodation on a permanent basis can normally be assumed to have given up residence in their former dwellings. The value of any interest such a person has in that house will normally be treated as part of his capital resources. But there is no compulsion on an authority to take into account the value of the house. In some circumstances an authority definitely should not do so, such as where the house is still being lived in by a spouse or a child. We are giving discretion to ignore or discount such capital assets in such cases. The position of a husband, wife or a dependent child is obvious, but there is another case where the Government believe that it would be entirely reasonable for an authority to exercise discretion. That is where a principal supporter or a carer continues to live in the house. Let me give a hypothetical case. An adult child, or perhaps a friend who was in no way related to the elderly or disabled person, could have spent many years living in the home and looking after the elderly person. It would be wrong if the elderly person went into part III accommodation and the interest of that carer to be disregarded and the local authority to take the value of the dwelling into account when assessing charges so that a sale is forced.

It is not difficult to envisage circumstances in which that discretion should be used. Normal residence and direct support of the elderly person can easily be checked. Furthermore, the elderly person could normally say whether he regarded the house as the only home of the person who had cared for him and whether he assumed that 'the carer' would be the beneficiary on his death.

When we make the new assessment regulations on which we are about to consult, we firmly intend to make provision for the continued exercise of local government discretion and to indicate that relevant circumstances should be taken into account. We believe that the circumstances such as I have described should be taken into account by local authorities and we shall seek to cover that in the regulations." — [Official Report, Standing Committee B, 19 April 1983; c. 574.]

The January 1984 background note says that it would be difficult to codify the circumstances in which the value of the home should be ignored without widening its scope to cover the home in all circumstances

"hence the present discretionary nature of the provision."

It therefore appears that, although the local authority can take account of the value of the interest of a home resident in a house, it is not obliged in all circumstances to do so. If it takes it into account it cannot compel the sale of the property, and it can agree that the debt should mount up to be paid eventually out of the estate of the home resident. In January 1984 the DHSS issued a consultative paper on charges for residental accommodation that is provided by local authorities under part III of the National Assistance Act 1948. The document says that it is proposed that

"where a local authority judges it appropriate, the value of a former dwelling or of other property should be taken into account."

It goes on to discuss circumstances in which the value of the home should be disregarded. It says:

"It is proposed also that the regulations should specify the circumstances in which the value of the family home must be disregarded and when a local authority has discretion to include its value in a charging assessment. Normally people who are in residential accommodation on a permanent basis can be assumed to have given up residence in their former dwelling and the value of any interest that person has in the property will be treated as part of his capital resources. However, the capital value of a resident's former home will be disregarded where a spouse, or a child under 16 years of age, continues to live there as his normal place of residence. For this purpose, it is proposed that the regulations should treat on the same basis as spouses all long-standing relationships in the same residence—irrespective of the sex of the partners and the nature of the partnership. The value of the property should be disregarded also where it has been and remains the permanent residence of a principal supporter. The latter, in addition to providing care, may also have been the financial mainstay of the household."

No decisions have yet been announced following the consultation period and the DHSS has not announced any date for the commencement for the operation of that system.

There is no doubt that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister was right to say what he said in Committee. There is no doubt, either, that the present situation is causing great upset and misery to many elderly people who are not able to take care of themselves. Admittedly the regulations make provision for local authorities to have a solicitor consulted on behalf of the person concerned, but, of course, that is not always easy, particularly where the person taken into care is senile and cannot look after himself. Therefore, several issues need to be carefully considered, and the Government must pay special regard to them.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I am sorry to interrupt my hon. Friend, as I know he is anxious to get on with his speech, but will he accept from me, on behalf of my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, that we are very concerned about the point that he has made? We are particularly concerned that elderly people should not be upset or worried by the misapprehensions that my hon. Friend has described. We shall certainly bear everything that he has said very much in mind.

Mr. Thorne: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for saying that. Perhaps I can do no better than illustrate my case by a recent example that was brought to my attention. It involves two elderly sisters, one aged 76 and the other just over 80. The older sister was taken into part III accommodation. I received correspondence from the younger sister, a Miss Gladys Lane, who used to live in Eastern avenue, Newbury Park, in my constituency. The house in which she lived with her older sister was the family house, and it had been owned by their parents. The family moved into it in 1934 and it was eventually passed on to the older sister. The two sisters lived together, sharing expenses on a 50-50 basis. Eventually the older sister had to be taken into a council home.

Through ignorance, the ownership of the property was vested in the older sister and the younger sister had no title to it. Although the older sister had left the property in her will to the younger sister and the younger sister quite naturally expected to inherit it in due course, she was in for a nasty shock. When the older sister went into a home, she was asked to pay the sum of £111·30 a week. That sum has now risen to £116·14 a week. To those ladies, that was an enormous sum. It was impossible for them to pay that money out of their normal income. The younger sister, who was left in the home in which she had lived since 1934, approached the local housing aid centre in York road, Ilford. She was offered a single person's bed sitting room with a shared bathroom. She objected to that offer and went to the citizens advice bureau, which found her a good solicitor.

After several months of negotiations the local council consented to the sale of the house and the purchase by the younger sister of—in the council's words—accommodation more suited to her needs. Miss Lane found the flat in which she now lives. It consists of a lounge, bedroom, kitchen and bathroom. She has settled in and has no complaints about it. However, a charge has been placed upon the flat by the local authority which must be repaid if she ever sells it. There was a difference of £6,000 between the proceeds of the sale of the house and the cost of the flat, after all the legal expenses had been paid. The council took every penny of this money and now has the deeds of the flat.

Miss Gladys Lane naturally feels that the law is cruel and unjust. She is unaware that hers is not an isolated case. According to the advice that she has received from the CAB and from her solicitor, the practice is widespread. The CAB advisers have told her that they constantly have to deal with similar cases involving sons, daughters, brothers, sisters and other family members living in properties which are legally occupied by a close relative. When the owning relative has to be taken into care, the family members find that they have no legal right to the property or interest in it of any kind.

In Miss Lane's case the council decided, as she had lived in the house for so long and it had been the family home, to allow her to purchase a small flat. However, Miss Lane, who was in her mid-70s, had to have a major fight with the council to persuade it to agree to that. She is most anxious that others in similar circumstances should not find themselves in the same predicament.

Miss Lane makes the point that she has never claimed anything from the state and had had no intention of doing so. She feels herself to be at a grave disadvantage in that this matter is hanging over her head. She feels that there is no just reason why that should be so.

[Mr. Thorne]

Moreover, Miss Lane's older sister, who is now in a council home, is a former civil servant. She had worked in the GPO telephone service all her life, and her pension is now paid by British Telecom. The money is paid into a Girobank account in the joint names of the two sisters. The older sister's pension amounts to about £165 a month and this, with the state pension, is her sole income. The younger sister, Miss Gladys Lane, has had to make an arrangement with the council whereby every quarter a cheque for £480 is paid over to the council to offset a portion of the debt which is building up for her older sister's keep in the home. Miss Lane is very worried about that. By 13 October this year the amount had risen to no less than £2,965·12 in spite of all her efforts to reduce it as much as possible. Through having lived throughout their lives without calling upon the state for support at all, the sisters are now debtors to part of the state system—through no fault of their own—to the extent of almost £3,000.

One might consider that that was enough—but no. Of the older sister's state pension, she receives only roughly £6·80 a week as pocket money. She still has to pay income tax on the pension which she receives from BT before the balance is shunted on to the council. The situation is appalling.

These elderly ladies have lived a life of hard work, dedication, effort and thrift. Our present Government do all that they can to encourage thrift. They encourage people to own their own homes. In view of the increasing number of us who are moving into the home-owning sector, I believe that such problems will increase in number.

Several matrons of elderly people's homes have told me that they do not like elderly people entering their homes with money raised either from their own assets or through the sale of their house, because such people enter the home feeling very resentful about the way in which the money has been taken away from them. Matrons have told me that, in their view, these elderly people should spend the money before they enter the home. They should go on a world cruise, ending up at Monte Carlo, and have a good time. They should get rid of everything they have, because no distinction is made between whether they finance their stay in the home or whether the DHSS and the ratepayer do so. That is a strange philosophy, and one which I do not believe the Government would normally wish to encourage.

However, there are other matters which we should consider. My hon. Friend may tell me that the local authority has discretion in the matter and can find part of the cost out of the rates. Some local authorities have been more profligate than others. The two elderly sisters live in the London borough of Redbridge, which has been Conservative-controlled for the past 20 years and has been extremely careful in balancing its budget. The council has made sure that it has not spent more than necessary, and the ratepayer has benefited. When such a council is then told to reduce its budget further, it finds it difficult to do so, because it has already cut spending to the bone.

The leader of Liverpool council was crowing on television last night about the fact that his council had rebelled against the Government and forced them into allowing the council an additional £30 million last year. Redbridge is not in that happy state. The council tries to follow not only the letter of the law, but the wishes of the Government about cutting back on expenditure and reducing manpower. There is therefore now no fat to cut away, and the council must look after every penny. It is therefore not able to give way on matters of discretion as easily as local councils which have built up a reserve of fat over the years.

If the Government wish to encourage thrift through investment particularly in home ownership, they must face the problems that could arise when one of the occupants of a property goes into part III accommodation. They must lay down strict guidelines, if necessary reinforced by law, to detail specifically what should happen to a property which has been occupied for some years by a companion, and especially if that person is a close relation.

If a companion has been sharing that accommodation for five or 10 years, or even longer, a legal entitlement to a 50 per cent. interest in that property should be written into the regulations. Such a person should be treated as a spouse. It is only through the support that is given by such people that the state is saved a great deal of money over many years. Such care prevents the other person having to go into hospital or part III accommodation at a much earlier date. I do not believe that to introduce such a measure would be charity—it would be doing the right and proper thing.

If a person goes into part III accommodation, we should make provision for him to make a capital payment. The cost of part III accommodation could easily be calculated. The person going into that accommodation should be able to buy an interest in it so that when he leaves that accommodation, either because of death, going into hospital or because he is taken out of care, the district valuer would find it feasible to reassess the value of that person's interest in the accommodation, and he or his estate could be reimbursed. The elderly person would not then feel aggrieved at the constant drain on his resources of between £5,000 and £6,000 a year at current prices. That person would have owned a part of the home in which he lived.

Of course, there would be the running costs of the home and the supervision required, which would be recurring charges. They could be set against the capital assets in due course if there were insufficient resources to fund those also. I see no reason why the elderly should not be given the right and the dignity to own an interest in the property they occupy for the remainder of their lives. It is what the Conservative party stands for—property ownership and the dignity of the elderly. The Government would be doing the right and proper thing if they extended home ownership into part III accommodation and allowed people to own an interest in it.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will throw some further light on the appalling position in which so many elderly people find themselves. They are worried about receiving a bill of such magnitude day after day, week after week, month after month and year after year, which mounts up to sums that are quite foreign to them because some of them retired many years ago. Sums in three or four figures worry them. We should try to lift the burden from those people and save them from taking the matron's advice and throwing it all away.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): In raising the question of charges for local authority residential accommodation my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) has raised an important and complex subject, and has done so with characteristic thoroughness and a pragmatic approach. It reminds me of the way in which he dealt with the last social services questions, not only in his capacity as an hon. Member, but as chairman of the National Council for Civil Defence. He mentioned the important issue of civil defence planning, and the effect on that of plans within the DHSS.

I welcome what my hon. Friend had to say this morning. I hope to clarify at least some of the misunderstandings about current arrangements. My hon. Friend drew attention to an apparent anomaly — that people admitted to local authority residential accommodation are required to pay towards its cost, while those in long-stay geriatric accommodation are not so required. My hon. Friend gave two excellent and telling examples of two elderly sisters residing in his constituency. We wish them well. It is right that time in the House is devoted not only to main issues but to the welfare of individuals.

The requirement on local authorities to provide residential accommodation for those "who by reason of age, infirmity or any other circumstance"

are in need of care and attention that is not otherwise available to them dates back to the National Assistance Act 1948. I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends who are now filling the Benches in the Chamber will be sorry not to have heard my hon. Friend make his point on that important issue.

The purpose is to provide accommodation for those no longer able to live in their own homes, even with the support of community services such as home helps and meals-on-wheels. It was never the intention that the state should relieve people directly of the cost of their accommodation and upkeep. Rather, the 1948 Act provides that those who enter residential accommodation —currently more than 100,000 people—should meet the cost of providing that accommodation to the extent that their means make that practicable.

The NHS was, of course, established for quite different purposes, and on the basis that health services are, in general, free at the time of need—something on which the Government set great store. The vast majority of patients receive treatment from their general practitioners or on an outpatient basis. It is true, unfortunately, that some patients are destined to spend the last years of their lives in hospital, despite the magnificent efforts made by consultant geriatricians, geriatric nurses and others to ensure that as many as possible are rehabilitated to the community or other long-term accommodation. To that extent, the position of the elderly patient in a geriatric ward, for whom there is no possibility of discharge, is similar to that of the elderly residents of an old people's home.

We have considered instituting "hotel charges" for NHS patients, but have rejected that essentially because hospitals are not geared for the billing and collection of debts on a large scale, especially as there would be exceptions for those in receipt of supplementary benefit, family income supplement and other forms of help from the social security system. I see my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security nodding. For such a charge to be worth collecting it would have to be set at a fairly high level, with the risk that it would deter people from seeking necessary treatment.

The Government have set their face against that. There are, however, provisions under which long-stay patients receiving retirement pensions and all other national insurance benefits which contain an element for day-to-day living have their benefits reduced after a certain period in hospital.

It being Eleven o'clock, MR. SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 5 (Friday sittings).

British Telecom

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a further statement about the privatisation of British Telecom.

This morning, Kleinwort Benson Ltd. on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has offered for sale 3,012 million ordinary shares in British Telecom plc at a price of 130p per share. The issue has been fully underwritten. Discussions are now taking place with a group of financial institutions, and I am hopeful that, within the next few hours, the shares being offered in the United Kingdom will have been fully applied for. Subject to the successful outcome of these discussions, the institutions will retain just over half these shares and the remainder will be made available for public offer next week. Prospectuses will be published on Tuesday 20 November, and the last date for applications will be 10 am on Wednesday 28 November. Copies of the prospectuses will be placed in the Library of the House today.

Of the shares on offer, 415 million, which is just under 14 per cent., have been provisionally allocated for issues to be made in New York, Tokyo and Toronto, and these are being underwritten by the Bank of England.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I thank the Minister for coming to the House to make the statement, although it is marginally disconcerting, as the hon. Gentleman will understand, to be handed a revised version two minutes before the statement was delivered.

This is an incredible day—a day when a Government who pretend to be worried about the future of high technology are announcing the price at which they intend to hand over to the whims of short-term profit maximisation the very industry that will be at the centre of the information technology revolution. It is a day when the Government are taking a public monopoly, which is answerable to Parliament, this House, the Minister and the Select Committees, and are creating a private monopoly that will control 95 per cent. of the telecommunications network and will be answerable to no one other than its shareholders. [Interruption.] Well, at the moment it is answerable to 55 million people.

While the price of 130p is precisely what I forecast in a broadcast two days ago, I repeat what I also said at that time: it is the wrong price. Are the Government aware that the very City experts who are advising the Government firmly expect that when those shares are traded on the stock exchange they will start trading at a premium of at least 10 per cent.? Does the Minister realise that that price will mean that the Government are selling control of more than £16 billion worth of public assets for less than £4 billion?

Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that, in addition to his price error, the combined cost of advertising by British Telecom this year and by the Government in relation to the launch and the commissions that will be paid to the underwriters and the banks will be at least £100 million and probably nearer £150 million — all to the Government's friends in the City? Is it not true that, behind the Government's boast that they intend to extend share ownership, they are taking this asset, which will earn £1·3 billion in profit this year, from the 55 million people of Britain who own it at present in order to sell it at a knockdown price to a relatively small proportion of those people?

Finally, is it not already clear, before British Telecom is sold, that the Government's guarantees are absolutely meaningless? The Minister has said that 14 per cent.—415 million shares—have been provisionally allocated for sales overseas. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that another 3 per cent.—90 million shares—will be bid for within this country out of the British tranche by an overseas consortium? Is there any control over such bids by other consortia? What action do the Government intend taking to stop the erosion of any control on the sale overseas?

Finally, in relation to these guarantees——

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Another one?

Mr. Williams: Yes, I am referring to the same guarantees. Have we not already seen the hollowness of the Government's pledge to domestic users that privatisation will mean that, for five years, prices will be cut to at least 3 per cent. below the cost of living? We have already seen, in anticipation of privatisation, increases of 7·1 per cent. for domestic rentals and 6·8 per cent. for domestic unit charges — both well above the cost of living — and reductions in prices for primarily trunk business users.

Mr. Pattie: The right hon. Gentleman has told the House that this announcement will have the remarkable effect of making British Telecom answerable to its shareholders, which, in his mind, is supposed to be a retrograde step. The Government believe that this step, which shows that it is bigger than all the Government's privatisation measures so far, will make British Telecom even more commercially aware than it has been. In future, British Telecom will have to satisfy both its customers and its shareholders. Apparently, the right hon. Gentleman thinks that does not matter.

The message that should go from the House is that we wish the chairman of British Telecom, his employees and the new shareholders after 3 December every success in making this the vigorous enterprise in the private sector that we know it will be. The right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) will understand the reasons why I cannot enter into any speculation about price considerations at this stage.

Sir Anthony Grant: Will my hon. Friend totally disregard the niggardly and preposterous objections from the Opposition about a policy that is entirely welcomed by Conservative Members and is designed to get the clammy hand of the state away from future technological industries? Conservative Members wish the policy every possible success.

In view of the Government's enthusiasm for wider share ownership and the spread of ownership, will there be any provisions to ensure that the many small investors will not find that their applications are swamped and the issues hogged by big business investors?

Mr. Pattie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his words of welcome. I can assure him that, as the Government's aim in this matter is to spread share ownership as widely as possible, the requests and applications of the smaller investor will be given priority wherever possible.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Will the Minister be a little more forthcoming? He ended by saying, "wherever possible". If the issue is over-subscribed, who will make the decisions on the allotment of shares? On what basis will that allotment be made? There will be many dissatisfied small investors if they find that, having been encouraged to buy shares in this institution, their applications are turned down. Will the Minister comment on the view held in the City that, if any other share issue had been handled in this way, it would have been illegal? Will he consult his colleagues and look into the possibility of extending the type of share offer that has been made in this case to other share offers so that a wider public can come forward to buy shares in other institutions?

Mr. Pattie: The precise basis of the allocation to which the hon. Gentleman referred will be decided by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I have said already, and I am happy to repeat it, that the Government are committed to wider share ownership and that we value small shareholders.

The hon. Gentleman made a rather serious point about possible illegalities. I should like to consider what he said. Perhaps he would like to write to me about it.

Mr. Rob Hayward (Kingswood): Does the Minister find the statement from the Opposition Front Bench particularly surprising in view of the fact that, during the Committee stage of the Telecommunications Bill, we were persistently told that the share offer to the public would be grossly under-subscribed because no one would find it attractive? Is it not a reflection of the expertise of all the BT employees that they have managed to convey to the public at large that they are now working for a modern communications system, and that large numbers of people in this country and abroad now wish to subscribe for shares in BT?

Mr. Pattie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. His reference to a change in attitude within BT is well substantiated, not only by the advent of privatisation but by the whole concept of greater competition which results from having other people coming into the market. It has produced a tangible improvement in the performance of BT. He is right in saying that the offer has created a great deal of interest here and abroad, because BT is a very powerful British and international company.

Mr. John Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): Is it not a disgrace that BT shares are being sold to the Yanks and the Japanese? Is it not a disgrace also that BT is now inviting three foreign equipment companies to tender for equipment for BT?

Will the Minister make it crystal clear to people abroad that when the Labour party renationalises BT it will do so in the interests of the taxpayer, the customer and the equipment manufacturing industry, and not in the interests of shareholders?

Mr. Pattie: The hon. Gentleman's line is somewhat predictable. We believe that investment in Britain is not a disgrace. The investment is not cajoled; it comes here because it wants to come here.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned equipment for BT. I am aware of the contract to which he referred. On the merits of that application, BT has decided that for the second source — the first source having been totally British—it wishes to invite further applications from the three consortia.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned what I regard as the remote and distant — not to say inconceivable — possibility of renationalisation by some future Labour Government. We believe that the interests of the taxpayer, the customer and the British manufacturer are totally safeguarded by the steps taken today.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): Will my hon. Friend agree that the history of recent privatisations—for example, British Aerospace and Cable and Wireless — shows that the employee shareholding is a crucial element in the operation? The right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) mentioned accountability. Will my hon. Friend agree that the attitude of people who work in such companies and who have had such opportunities is wholly beneficial? Does it not hold out high hopes in that respect for the future of BT?

Mr. Pattie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments, because he takes a close interest in these matters. People who are prepared to accept the evidence of their eyes and ears will know that what he said is correct. When people appreciate that they are working for a company in which—as my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) said—the clammy hand of the state is not guiding all the marketing and commercial decisions, and that they have better possibilities and opportunities, their performance and that of the company improves accordingly.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Does not the Minister realise that he is flogging off the interest in investment, already made in BT by the 55 million people of this country, to a small number of people for their own private interest? Does he not understand that this doctrinaire attempt to widen the basis of share ownership is bound to fail once those shares become available on the open market?

Mr. Pattie: I cannot see why it is wrong for ordinary people in this country to be given the opportunity to own part of a major national undertaking. The hon. Gentleman is making a forecast about the market for share dealing, and I dare say that his opinion is as good as that of anyone else, but the incentives, including those being offered in regard to telephone bills, will persuade people to keep the shares for all sorts of very good reasons.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): Will the Minister agree that those who have had a hand in the share issue have stimulated an interest in share ownership which is far beyond that previously experienced? May I suggest that we learn a lesson from the experience? It is not simply the privatisation programme that is important but the use of it to educate people in the holding of shares.

Mr. Pattie: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend not only for that remark but for his appreciation, which I am happy to echo from the Dispatch Box, of the work of all the people who have been involved in bringing BT to flotation today. We are grateful to our advisers and all the officials who have worked so hard in my Department and in the Treasury. I am also grateful to my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), who laboured long and hard to bring the matter to a happy conclusion.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Now that the sole criterion for this huge organisation is to be profitability, what steps can the Government take to protect the millions of pounds that are paid from the DHSS and other Departments for the benefit of the elderly and the disabled? The standing charges for free telephones for those living alone are now paid by the public. Is there any way in which those charges could be reduced, rather than profitability being the only criterion?

Mr. Pattie: The hon. Gentleman's points will be matters for discussion between the Departments concerned —particularly the DHSS—and the management of BT. Wherever there are what might be described as social considerations, arrangements will have to be made, and the company will say on what basis it wishes to provide those services. The Government have made it clear that they wish them to continue.

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): Will my hon. Friend agree that this is not just a memorable day but an historic day in this House? Will he agree that it is welcomed by Conservative Members, just as it is self-evidently welcomed by the public, because the share issue will be over-subscribed? It is also welcomed by the staff of BT. Will my hon. Friend agree that it is one of the finest ways of ensuring investment from the private sector and relieving the burden on the taxpayer?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): It has been a poor Tory turn-out for an historic occasion.

Mr. Pattie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. I agree with him that it is an historic day—although, as the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) says, there could have been more people here to witness it. History is sometimes made when the audience is not very large, but I am sure that we are very happy to have the hon. Gentleman here.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will not the Minister come clean? Is it not true that historically Governments wishing to raise revenue have put up income tax, value added tax or national insurance contributions, whereas this Government cheat by selling off the nation's assets, which have been built up through constant investment over the years? One day the British cupboard of assets will be bare and the Government will then have to face reality. May I say to Labour supporters outside that I hope that they will not buy the shares. If they do, they will be propping up the Government's disastrous financial policies.

Mr. Pattie: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's message will be heard; whether it will be heeded remains to be seen. At the time of the British Aerospace flotation, advice from union circles urged members not to take up the offer. The great virtue of this type of exercise is that it is up to individuals to decide. In that case, individuals decided to take up the allocation of the shares. I am sure that ordinary men and women will take the opportunity that is offered and will disregard the extraordinary advice of the hon. Gentleman. I am sure that they will not regard the exercise as selling off the nation's assets when they will be having a share in those assets.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): I join those who have warmly welcomed the Government's move as part of the programme to restore the nation's assets to the people of the nation. Does my hon. Friend believe that BT employees will subscribe to the shares, and has sufficient allowance been made for that so that they may participate in their own business and have a full sense of involvement and ownership in this great industry?

Mr. Pattie: We believe that the employees will subscribe to the shares. Provided that they apply, there is a free allocation of shares for them as well as a special bonus arrangement in a certain ratio to the shares acquired. It is very important indeed that BT employees respond favourably to the offer and we hope very much that they will do so.

Mr. Skinner: In view of the international selling, are the Government proud of the fact that there is nothing to prevent the Libyans buying shares in BT? What amending legislation is the Minister prepared to introduce to prevent that? The Libyans might well use for that purpose the money that they have obtained from Britain as a result of the Tories' purchase of an extra 400,000 tonnes of Libyan oil. Has the Minister considered the image that may result, with Mr. Gaddafi on one end of the line, Mrs. Thatcher on the other and Buzby in the middle?

Mr. Pattie: I can only assume that by "Buzby" the hon. Gentleman has Arthur Scargill in mind.

Mr. Skinner: You are allowing it.

Mr. Pattie: I am not sure whether the hairdo is appropriate, although I realise that I am not in the best position to make jokes about that. We stand by the conviction of the institutions as to the importance of the offer. Among those institutions we hope that the NUM pension fund will be very important.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): Has the Minister noticed that, on the day of this important announcement, the Liberal Benches are entirely empty, showing Liberal Members' lack of interest in the Government's programmes and policies? Is he aware that, in selling BT, the Government are turning a justifiable public monopoly into what Lord Weinstock described as an unjustifiable private monopoly? On foreign investment, is he aware that in selling off NTT over five years the Japanese have had the good sense to disallow foreign investment so as to ensure that high technology developments resulting from future developments in their telecommunications industry will remain firmly in Japanese hands and under Japanese control? Why have the British Government not shown the same wisdom?

Mr. Pattie: There is no reason why less than 14 per cent. foreign investment should mean that important new developments in advanced technology will go abroad. The company's interest will be substantially to maintain technological developments from excellent establishments such as Martlesham within the United Kingdom, so I see no need for the steps suggested by the hon. Lady.

Referring back to the important point about BT employees raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth), I should make it clear that each employee can apply for 54 free shares now, worth just over £70, and receive two free shares for every share purchased, up to a maximum of 154 shares. That is a very important start.

Mr. Williams: Is the Minister aware that the new private corporation will be answerable to shareholders, most of whom will have too small a holding to be significant, which is no substitute for accountability to the House, to Select Committees and to Ministers? He said that the corporation would have to satisfy the customers, but as a private monopoly it will have no need to do so. Indeed, the incentive to do so will be reduced because the corporation will not be answerable to the House and the voice of the consumer will be weaker in the new organisation.

Will the Minister now answer the important question that he has so far ignored about the overseas consortium intending to buy from within the United Kingdom tranche to the tune of nearly 100 million shares if it can get its hands on them? Is he aware of that consortium and is he concerned about it? Does he intend to take any action, or will overseas buyers be able to apply indiscriminately within the United Kingdom tranche in addition to the 450 million shares allocated for sale overseas?

On equipment purchases, will the Minister confirm that at present 95 per cent. of BT's equipment needs are met from within the United Kingdom and that £13 billion worth of orders per year are placed with British firms, keeping 70,000 jobs in more than 80 private companies? Is he aware that the chairman has said that as soon as BT is privatised he intends to place more orders with foreign factories?

Mr. Pattie: I will take those questions in reverse order. On the last point, I am not aware of the statement by the chairman Sir George Jefferson, to which the right hon. Gentleman refers. Naturally the chairman will wish the company to operate in the most commercially successful way possible. As I know from my many discussions with Sir George Jefferson, he does all that he can to support the British equipment industry and is prepared to lean as heavily as he can in that direction, but he will not be subjected to the clammy hand of Government direction, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) described it, compelling BT to make acquisitions from parts of British industry whose equipment may not be the most up to date. We wish to achieve greater efficiency and greater pressure from competitive power. Telling British industry that it can rely on BT orders for ever and a day does not help it to be more effective and competitive in world markets. British companies have the opportunity to tender and will obviously get the lion's share of BT equipment orders in years to come. We are simply letting in an element of competition, in the same way as the Ministry of Defence has done.

I am not aware of the overseas consortium to which the right hon. Gentleman refers. He will appreciate that I cannot comment publicly from the Dispatch Box at this stage about how share prices may move or who might want to purchase the shares. As the right hon. Gentleman well knows, however, there is a limit of 10 per cent. on all applications and that will be very closely scrutinised.

Mr. Williams: That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Pattie: With respect, it has something to do with it because the overseas dealings will begin after applications have closed on the London stock exchange at 10 am on 28 November, when 14 per cent. or slightly less than that will be available for overseas investors.

Mr. Williams: So they can buy anything they like?

Mr. Pattie: I must continue, as the right hon. Gentleman made another important point. He seems not to appreciate that competition will be policed by Professor Carsberg, director-general of the Office of Telecommunications — DG-Oftel — who, through his advice to the Government on the Jove application for the joint value added network service between IBM and BT, has already shown that he takes the need for competition very seriously. That is the best safeguard that we can have.

Sheltered Accommodation

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.

11.29 am

Mr. Patten: Furthermore, this reflects in part the fact that they are relieved of some of the costs of living at home. I accept that the different arrangements applicable to long-stay patients and residents in old people's homes can be regarded as an anomaly. I think that I see my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South seeking to ask me to give way on that point.

Mr. Thorne: Will my hon. Friend please take into consideration the very unpleasant effect that constant bills have on the elderly? It is one problem for young people to receive them, but it is another when elderly people receive substantial bills. In this case, my constituent received a bill for her sister's accommodation for nearly £3,000. Every quarter yet another bill arrives, so the bill becomes greater quarter by quarter. She has already paid £6,000, so the most recent bill makes the total £9,000. She would like to know what happens when the entire value of the present accommodation is used up. Is that not an immoral way to proceed? Should we not be much more humane and let the sister carry on with her life without that millstone hanging round her neck?

Mr. Patten: I entirely appreciate my hon. Friend's concern for the welfare of his constituent and his constituent's sister. I shall bear in mind everything that he said. Perhaps my hon. Friend will be so good as to write to me with full details, including the bills that he mentioned this morning, so that as soon as possible I can go into the important points that he made on behalf of his constituent, with his characteristic care.

We have no plans to introduce "hotel charges" for NHS patients, or to abolish the 1948 provisions under which residents in local authority homes are required to contribute towards the cost of their accommodation. My hon. Friend also drew attention, in his most interesting speech, to the current arrangements for assessing what the contribution should be. We are open to new ideas. The current charging system is designed to reflect people's ability to contribute to the costs of their accommodation.

There has been concern that those charging arrangements need revision—my hon. Friend has been foremost in suggesting it—and particularly that they should be brought into line with the rules for paying supplementary benefit where, for example, capital of up to £3,000 is disregarded. Earlier this year we issued a consultative document setting out proposals for new revised arrangements. The response was not enthusiastic. Generally, our proposals were regarded as too complex. One of the points about consultation is getting such feedback. The arrangements were regarded as too complex, particularly those for calculating the notional income which should be assumed to derive from capital.

Since the proposals were issued we have, of course, started to review arrangements for supplementary benefits, as my hon. Friend will be aware. We have decided to delay further consideration of the whole range of issues that lie behind the points made by my hon. Friend until that review is complete. I assure my hon. Friend, however, that in taking our thinking forward we shall give careful consideration to the points that he made so lucidly.

Mobility Allowance

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I am glad to have the opportunity of raising the case of Shelley and Russell Tulloch.

The case raises interesting topical questions concerning mobility allowances and who is eligible to qualify. Shelley and Russell are two constituents of mine who live in Melbourne, which recently won the best-kept village competition in Derbyshire. Shelley was born in December 1960, and therefore will soon be 24, and Russell was born in October 1962, and is now 22. When Shelley was three, it was clear that something was seriously wrong. She was diagnosed as suffering from a rare chromosomal abnormality. By that time, Russell had been born, and it was too late. That family now has two vigorous mentally handicapped adults in the household.

The main feature of the disability is mental handicap. It is slowly progressive, getting worse in the most tragic way. It is accompanied by mild motor problems, such as clumsiness. Russell also has petit mal and is treated with phenobarbitones and other drugs. However, it appears that his condition is not controlled, but is slowly getting worse. Indeed, the drugs seem to make his behaviour more unpredictable and make him less co-operative. Shelley does not have those problems, but she is much more aggressive than her brother and also occasionally suffers from deafness. The main difficulty with them both is behavioural problems, because they are unpredictable, and can be very noisy, aggressive and persistent. They tend to pester strangers and their activities may be unreliable.

I should like to quote from the original application by Mrs. Tulloch for the mobility allowance back in September 1982. It explains clearly what the family's problems are. Mrs. Tulloch said:

"I am applying for the Mobility Allowance on their behalf to help towards the cost of my own transport, which is a necessity to enable us to have any life outside the house, as I cannot cope with them alone on public transport for the following reasons:—

1. They are very outgoing by nature but can be aggressive towards me when restrained.

2. They can make a nuisance of themselves with other passengers by going to sit with strangers and chatting incessantly about nothing or asking personal questions. Some people don't mind, but others do, or are unable to cope with the situation.

3. They argue and fight with each other a lot which can be embarrassing, especially if they start swearing.

4. Public transport runs to time schedules, mentally handicapped people can be very stubborn when they want to and 5/10 minutes on your side makes a great deal of difference when you have appointments to keep. Public transport will not wait for you!

5. We live in a rural area and I travel 8 miles into the nearest town at least twice a week to take them to a Youth Club, as there are no facilities for them in our immediate area. If I went by bus we would have to walk about a ¼ mile from the nearest bus stop to the Club. On other evenings I take them to other places or just for a run somewhere to get them out. They don't like walking any distance, and their powers of concentration are poor, consequently they will not sit at anything for long, so I find through experience the best solution is to take them out. I also have regular hospital, dental and doctor's appointments to keep for both of them."

As part of the exercise for today's debate, I asked Mrs. Tulloch to make a note of the essential mileage that she did on behalf of those young people that was associated not with their attendance at the day centre, but with activities such as riding for the disabled, sports clubs, swimming and attendance at a gateway club run by the local branch of Mencap. To her own astonishment, she realised that she was doing over 9,000 miles a year in her own car on behalf of the two young people. The result is a commendable quality of life. It is entirely right that I should pay tribute to Mr. and Mrs. Tulloch for the care, dignity, intelligence and good humour with which they have cared for those very disabled young people for more than 20 years, and with which they intend to go on caring for them.

We should also pay tribute to all the staff at the special school that the young people used to attend in my constituency and now at the Newhall adult training centre run by Derbyshire social services, and all the professional staff associated with Russell and Shelley, for the extraordinary way that they help the family to cope. I have no doubt from what I have seen elsewhere that without such attention and care both those young people would have been in institutions a long time ago.

The difficulties are recognised through the payment of attendance allowance for both young people and, of course, they both qualify for non-contributory invalidity pension. However, Mrs. Tulloch does not qualify for invalid care allowance, as she is a married woman. Whatever the difficulties of coping with one mentally handicapped person in the household, I am sure that the House will recognise that they are compounded by there being two.

The history of the application for mobility allowance starts more than two years ago. On 22 September 1982 the claim for mobility allowance for both young people was received and a medical examination was arranged. The examination was carried out on 29 December 1982 and refusal was recommended. On 18 February 1983, Mrs. Tulloch lodged an appeal. A further medical examination by the medical board took place on 8 June 1983 and it recommended acceptance and payment of mobility allowance for Shelley and Russell. There was jubilation in the Tulloch household when they were informed of the positive decision on 18 July. It is worth observing as an aside that it had taken nearly nine months from applying for to being granted. Although the allowance is backdated, the delay is typical and is much to be regretted.

The Secretary of State then decided to appeal to a medical appeal tribunal and the hearing was held on 22 September 1983. The Secretary of State's appeal was allowed and mobility allowance was refused. The family was notified on 2 November 1983. An appeal against a medical appeal tribunal's decision can be made only on a matter of law.

My involvement commenced soon after. Till June 1983, Mr. and Mrs. Tulloch had been the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost), who I know had been active on their behalf and had given them excellent advice. That it was excellent advice is shown by the fact that they had achieved mobility allowance. I first met them on 18 November 1983 and I wrote to the Secretary of State on 6 December. I know that the letter was received as it was acknowledged. Unfortunately, everything seemed to grind to a halt at that point. I wrote again on 29 February and again on 17 July 1984. I am not being awkward and I hope that I have not been nagging. I know that Ministers are deeply and genuinely concerned about the mentally handicapped. They have shown that in regard to many cases. However, I must ask whether it would be possible to have a reply to the correspondence that I have sent during the best part of what now amounts to one year.

Why did the DHSS appeal against the award when it had been granted after two medical examinations? Why did the Department not leave well alone? I think that part of the answer lies in the Secretary of State's observations to the second appeal, which goes to the heart of mobility allowance regulations and limitations. I should like to quote from it. Mobility allowance is payable under the Social Security Act 1975 to someone who is suffering from physical disablement to the extent that he is either unable to walk or virtually unable to do so. As to the virtual inability to walk, the Secretary of State observed:

"It is for the tribunal to decide how far ability is affected by impairment of balance, inco-ordination of movement, behavioural limitations, the need for guidance, supervision or support . . . In their statement of reasons for three decisions dated 4 January 1983 a Tribunal of Social Security Commissioners gave guidance on the relevance of assistance needed and behavioural factors in determining whether a person is unable or virtually unable to walk. The Commissioners decided that a person who is able to walk only with assistance (ie guidance, supervision or support) should not for that reason alone necessarily be found to be unable or virtually unable to walk. The Commissioners considered however that the need for such assistance was a facet of the manner in which a person could make progress on foot and should be taken into account by the adjudicating authorities . . . Similarly the Commissioners considered that behavioural limitations on a person's walking ability would also generally affect the manner, and possibly the speed, of his walking. They considered that if a person could be caused to move himself to a designated place only with the benefit of guidance and supervision and possibly after much cajoling the point may be reached at which the person may be found to be virtually unable to walk."

That view was clearly taken in the first appeal but not in the second.

This is the crux of the matter. There is no argument about these young people being able to put one foot in front of the other. If they were in the House, they could walk from one end to the other. They have some trouble with steps and may have difficulty if they are not familiar with the area. It also depends substantially on their mood whether they will budge at all. That is not the problem. The more important fact is that they cannot go far without supervision. They cannot use public transport alone—they would be in some danger if they did and they would certainly be a nuisance to other passengers. They require constant care, guidance and control and without help they are just as housebound as if they were physically handicapped.

I am aware that many cases are under review. One is currently under discussion in another place. The entire issue of disability is under review. That effort by right hon. and hon. Members is to be welcomed. The question is whether mentally handicapped people are disabled. I say that they are, as they cannot travel independently. I believe that we should change the mobility allowance rules and allow them to claim.

Mobility allowance has been one of the most successful of all recent benefits. More than 300,000 people currently claim the comparatively modest sum of just over £18 a week and about 10 per cent. have commuted the money to enable them to buy a vehicle. Since 1979, there has been a more than 100 per cent. increase in the benefit in cash terms. There is no doubt that the Government have made every effort to be generous to disabled people. However, the regulations are restrictive and out of date. They were old-fashioned when they were proposed, in that they did not take account of mentally handicapped people who are now living in the community in greater numbers. If we are to make headway in caring for such people in the community and if we are to give reasonable support to such families and parents, we should grant applications such as this.

Tragically, sooner or later, this family will have to give up caring for these disabled people at home. Shelley and Russell's conditions are getting worse and their parents are getting no younger. However, it will happen later by many years rather than sooner if appropriate help is given. It is the DHSS's view, which is well stated in many policy documents, that it is cheaper and better to care for people at home. That has been at the heart of DHSS policy for many years. I therefore urge my hon. Friend to consider these matters sympathetically.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) for raising this sad case today. I am glad that she has had an opportunity to do so. She will realise that, in view of the way in which she has, with her customary initiative, seized the opportunity at fairly short notice, I have not been able to refresh my mind on the details of the case to the extent that I would normally wish before replying. She deserves the admiration of her constituents for the way in which she has pursued the case and for raising it today. Constituents who have such an assiduous Member of Parliament pursuing their interests are indeed lucky.

The debate enables me warmly to join in my hon. Friend's tribute to Mr. and Mrs. Tulloch for their devoted work in bringing up Shelley and Russell. Their work must command the admiration of us all. Having experienced the problems that mental handicap can bring, though not in my immediate family, I appreciate what devotion must have been required from Mr. and Mrs. Tulloch. I have listened with great sympathy to what my hon. Friend has said. I shall study her speech with care and look into the delay in responding to her letters. I shall ensure that we are in touch with her as soon as possible.

I endorse what my hon. Friend said about the importance of mobility allowance and about the emphasis that the Government have put on it and confirm the figures that she gave. Mobility allowance is now received by about 340,000 claimants, at a cost of about £360 million a year. The Government's commitment to the benefit is reflected in the fact that it will have been virtually doubled by the uprating in a week's time, when it will reach £20 a week. It is an important benefit in the network of benefits available to disabled people.

At a tangent to the main thrust of my hon. Friend's argument, I noted her reference to the delays that take place in processing mobility allowance claims. It is an inescapable fact that if a claim goes to appeal, whatever its route, it is likely to experience longer delays than an ordinary, straightforward claim. Given that the numbers of claims for the benefit have been rising rapidly—the Government welcome that—and that their assessment depends on the use of scarce medical manpower, the difficulties are clear.

My hon. Friend knows that it was as a result of our general concern about the delays occurring to mobility allowance claims that my predecessor as Minister for the Disabled, my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), commissioned a report by a retired civil servant, Peter Oglesby. The report made a number of recommendations, including ways to speed up the administration of mobility allowance claims. The Government have acted on a significant number of those recommendations, although some remain under consideration.

As a result, the past two years have shown a significant speeding up of the processing of mobility allowance claims. I pay tribute to the work of our officials at North Fylde central office in Norcross, who have put great effort into improving the way in which claims are handled. We are doing everything we can to reduce those delays and to keep them to a minimum, and we have already had considerable success.

I now turn to specific issues connected with the case of Mr. and Mrs. Tulloch and of Shelley and Russell. In view of the age of Shelley and Russell, any claim for mobility allowance is technically a claim by them. For anyone over 16, the claim and payment of the benefit is to the individual concerned rather than to his parents. Perhaps that shows how difficult it would be to follow my hon. Friend's suggestion and consider some mobility allowance claims together and some circumstances as a whole. The benefit is paid to individuals and claimed by individuals. If one attempted to consider some claims together, it would be difficult to decide which individuals should be lumped together for the purposes of a claim. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept the considerable difficulties which her suggestion would create.

My hon. Friend implied that in the adjudication on such a benefit it should be possible to consider circumstances such as the availability of public transport and other factors affecting the environment of claimants. I have heard that argument before. At first one reacts sympathetically to it, but when one considers it seriously it is difficult to see how one could make differentiations equitably in the payment of this or other social security benefits according to geographical location. To give an obvious and crude example, it would be absurd if a person who happened to live in north London was refused mobility allowance because he was on a bus route and consequently moved to a remote village in Essex to qualify because he was no longer on a bus route. I hope that my hon. Friend accepts the difficulties inherent in such differentiation.

The major thrust of my hon. Friend's remarks related to the position of mentally handicapped people under the mobility allowance scheme. As she said, there has recently been difficulty in interpreting the regulations for mentally handicapped people and for other categories of potential or aspiring claimants. They include blind people, whose needs were the subject which last brought me to my feet in the House this week, and of deaf-blind people.

There are obvious difficulties and disadvantages in specifying particular types of disability as automatically qualifying for benefits designed to reduce the consequences of disability. I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that many mentally handicapped people would not qualify for mobility allowance. I have visited the large mentally handicapped hospital in my constituency on a number of occasions. Many people there have no difficulty in walking and making their way about, although they are mentally handicapped. However, I accept that certain conditions and degrees of mental handicap can cause real difficulties in that direction. I merely seek to establish that one cannot sensibly say that mental handicap alone, without regard to its degree, extent or consequences, should be taken as an automatic passport to the payment of mobility allowance.

Recently, the process of determining the interpretation of the mobility allowance rules has given rise to considerable discussion among adjudication authorities —this will soon reach even higher levels—about how the regulations should be applied to the mentally handicapped, the blind, the deaf-blind and other categories. As my hon. Friend said, a tribunal of social security commissioners dealt with claims from three mentally handicapped children in an effort to clarify the interpretation of the legislation for people who needed assistance to move around. The decision was reported as R(M)1/83. In their decision, the commissioners held that the need for guidance, supervision and support was a facet of the manner in which a person could make progress on foot and therefore should be considered by independent adjudicating authorities in deciding claims, but that it was not in itself conclusive.

Earlier this year, the Court of Appeal gave judgment in the case R(M)1/84, which involved a blind person who had directional problems. In that case, the question of guidance, supervision and support was a relevant factor. The claimant was unsuccessful, but the extent to which the judgment affects the conclusions reached in R(M)1/83 is arguable. Case law is therefore in an unsatisfactory state, but we hope that that will be resolved, as the case reported in R(M)1/84 is now on appeal before the House of Lords in its judicial capacity. The hearing is due on 7 March 1985 according to my latest information. I am sorry that that is still some time ahead. When we have the results, we shall consider the need for further guidance and, if necessary, we shall amend the regulations in the light of it. I can make no promises about what we might think it appropriate to do in the light of the outcome, but we are conscious of the difficulties in interpreting the regulations in cases such as those of Shelley and Russell Tulloch. Although I cannot hold out an immediate hope of a dramatic change, I hope that I have said enough to show that we are worried about the problem and that we wish the position to be more clear.

I cannot say much more to my hon. Friend today. We are genuinely and deeply sympathetic to the problems that she described, and I am glad to know that the Tullochs are receiving substantial support from the social security system in the form of attendance allowances in both cases and non-contributory invalidity pensions, which will shortly become severe disablement allowances, in both cases. That reflects Ministers' anxiety — certainly my anxiety as a social security Minister with responsibility for the disabled — to ensure that support is available to families in such circumstances. I can say nothing more about the specific mobility allowances in this case, but I shall be in touch with my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Tranquillisers

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I am grateful to the Minister for giving me the opportunity of raising this matter at such short notice. I wish to bring to the attention of the House a fairly well known and widely canvassed problem that is developing steadily with regard to the use of benzodiazepine drugs, which are more commonly known as tranquillisers. There are 10 or 12 drugs in that generic group, and I noticed from the statement of the Secretary of State the other day that many of the branded drugs that were taken off the prescription list will in future be obtained only privately and will be replaced in the National Health Service by substitute drugs. I welcome the use of generic substitutes, but I draw to the Government's attention the fact that the problem of addiction will be just as great.

In reply to questions from me on 9 November, the Minister for Health said that in 1980 23·9 million prescriptions were issued for drugs within the group. To make clear what I am talking about, the group includes drugs such as Valium, Librium, Anxon, Ativan, Frisium, Halciom, Mogadon, Normison, Serenia-D and Transene. In 1981, the figure rose to 24·2 million; in 1982 it was 24·4 million; and for the first nine months of 1983— one accepts that it takes time to collate the figures— there were 17·7 million prescriptions. We cannot say how many drugs are issued with each prescription, but at a conservative estimate we are talking about more than 100,000 capsules in only nine months.

I accept that there are clinical needs for what might be called anti-depressants, but I do not accept that the present method of prescribing them is always in the best interests of the patients. I do not challenge the clinical judgment of doctors, but I shall draw to the attention of the House some of the effects of prescription policy. It has been estimated by Professor Malcolm Lader, who is the professor at the Institute of Psychiatry and who has carried out research into this matter at Maudsley hospital in London for about five years, that there are about 100,000 tranquilliser addicts or dependants. He considers that to be a conservative estimate, and that the real figure is nearer 250,000.

Why has that happened? Dependency upon those drugs causes many side effects such as agoraphobia, nausea, a loss of the sleep pattern, an effect on one's ability to enjoy life and a general state of depression. Indeed, some of the researchers explained that the side effects are often such that they constitute a need for further drugs of the same generic structure.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): My hon. Friend welcomed the change to generic drugs. Is there not a danger that the problem may be aggravated where a medical practitioner is subjected to pressure by his patient to prescribe the branded drug, because the patient has become convinced that the generic substitute, although technically the same, does not alleviate the problem that the patient believes exists? The problems could increase in the coming years as more people reject the generic substitutes because they have convinced themselves that those drugs will not deal effectively with their problems.

Mr. Bermingham: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. I hope that we convince the Government that there is need for action, for further research and for more self-help groups to wean people off the drugs. We also need a revision in medical practice to avoid the problems to which my hon. Friend refers. I welcome the introduction of generic substitutes, but even they will give rise to addiction and dependency.

We have all heard of the "smartie" syndrome. One visits the local practitioner and says to him, "I am feeling a bit off." The doctor is often rushed—I accept that that happens—and gives the patient a prescription for a pick-me-up, which may be Valium, Librium or any of the other benzodiazepine drugs.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but Valium does not pick one up; it puts one down.

Mr. Bermingham: I accept the Minister's comment, but the point is that the drugs are designed to get rid of depression. A few weeks later the patient returns to the doctor and his symptoms have not changed. Sometimes he will not even see the doctor, but will pick up a repeat prescription from the receptionist. That is not good medical practice. Women's Own magazine, which conducted a large-scale survey on the matter, showed that there were cases of people being prescribed such drugs for as long as 18 years. Who needs medication for 18 years, or even for four years? There are clear signs that an addiction problem has grown.

I hope that the Government will begin to fund research into the problem and self-help groups. The Minister for Health said recently, in reply to my question, that about £10,000 is spent on self-help groups. That is nowhere near enough. We must do four things: first, stop repeat prescriptions; secondly, enable doctors to have time clinically to treat their patients; thirdly, be on our guard to prevent people being given drugs for long periods; and, fourthly, fund massive research to alleviate the problem.

Mr. John Patten: I welcome the contribution made by the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) to this debate, raised at short notice. I shall write to him on all the points that he has raised.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at 12 noon.

TRANSPORT

Severn Crossing

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received the outstanding consultants' reports on the Severn crossing; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Copies of the reports listed below have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. They provide the expected confirmation of the general extent and type of strengthening necessary for the crossing to cope with future traffic loading.

(1) Independent Appraisal of the Wye Bridge and Viaduct and the Beachley Viaduct—by Husband & Co.

This confirms the earlier findings of the Flint & Neill Partnership (published in May 1983) about the strengthening work that will be necessary.

(2) Appraisal of Aust viaduct—by Husband & Co.

This updates the appraisal which Husband & Co. carried out in May 1983 as a sub-contract for the Flint & Neill Partnership.

(3) Independent assessment of the Aust viaduct—by the Flint & Neill Partnership.

This is the check of Husband & Co's appraisal (item (2) above). The two firms are generally agreed on the work that is necessary.

(4) Report on the risk of ship collision with the piers of the Severn crossing—by the Flint & Neill Partnership and Husband & Co.

The consultants conclude that it is only necessary to investigate protective measures for the piers of the Aust viaduct. The risk to the piers of the Wye bridge will be the subject of a separate report.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Bus Lanes

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions there have been in the latest 12 months for which figures are available for driving in bus lanes in the Metropolitan Police area.

Mr. Mellor: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that 4,100 prosecutions were brought against motorists in 1981 for driving in bus lanes and 3,500 in 1982; the corresponding figure for 1983 is not available.

ENVIRONMENT

Green Belt

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Enviroment when he will make an announcement about his decisions on the transfer of the Greater London Council's interests in land under the Green Belt (London and Home Counties) Act 1938.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have placed a paper in the Library of the House today.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Outgoers' Scheme

Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will be in a position to invite more milk producers to commit themselves to joining the outgoers' scheme.

Mr. MacGregor: In England and Wales 4,826 applicants originally expressed interest in becoming outgoers and at the beginning of last month we invited 2,747 of the smaller producers to commit themselves to the scheme. We expected however that a considerable number might, in the event, decide not to go out of production after all and this has in fact proved to be the case. We are therefore now able to invite a further group of about 380 applicants to take the place of those who have dropped out.

The original group comprised those with quota of up to 200,000 litres and if all had accepted this would have amounted to 278·8 million litres of quota released. The second group now being invited to join comprises those between 200,000 and 250,000 litres, amounting to a further 94·2 million litres. As before, a small number are being excluded because milk is only a relatively small part of their overall farming enterprise.

In the light of the response we receive we shall send out further invitations as necessary to replace any producers who drop out.

The original target of buying up 289 million litres of quota in England and Wales was more than four times oversubscribed. Even though a significant number of producers may drop out, I have no reason to believe that the target will not be met.

EMPLOYMENT

Information Technology Centres

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on information technology centres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The first information technology centres were established just over three years ago. There are now more than 150 ITeCs in operation and it is planned to extend the total number of centres to 175. ITeCs have made a substantial contribution to training under the youth training scheme. They also provide an invaluable source of expertise in new technology and have the potential to play a wider role in the provision of training and related services in their localities. The changes which are now being made, and which are set out below, will help to encourage ITeCs to widen their activities in this way.

ITeCs are currently jointly funded by the Manpower Services Commission, the Department of Trade and Industry and individual scheme sponsors. For training carried by ITeCs under the youth training scheme, the commission funds trainee allowances and makes a substantial contribution to adult staff salaries, operating costs and capital costs. In addition, the Department of Trade and Industry makes available pump-priming funds over the first three years of each centre's existence to assist with capital purchases, software development and the payment of salaries sufficient to recruit and retain the necessary specialist adult staff.

It has been the intention from the start of ITeC programme that by the end of the first three yeas of operation each centre should be in a position to operate without further funding from the Department of Trade and Industry. Some centres coming to the end of their third year are not yet in that position. I am asking centres to move to it as quickly as possible. Meanwhile, I have agreed that the commission should provide any necessary additional adult staff salary support as a temporary measure for the period until 31 October 1985.

In addition, arrangements are being made to allow ITeCs to retain a proportion of any income which they generate as a contribution towards the cost of the replacement of capital equipment. Arrangements are also being made to allow ITeCs to use a further proportion of their revenues as a contribution towards salaries of adult staff from 1 November 1985. I am also examining certain technical rules which inhibit ITeCs from extending the range of their activities. Relaxation of such rules should significantly increase the potential of ITeCs to generate income.

Taken together, these changes should consolidate and increase the role of ITeCs in their localities and thus enhance our efforts to accelerate training in new technology.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

El Salvador

Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the implications for United Kingdom policy towards El Salvador of the talks initiated by President Duarte with the FMLN/FDR guerrilas.

Mr. Renton: We welcome President Duarte's initiative, which is in line with his commitment to strengthen democracy, and to work for national reconciliation and an improvement in human rights in El Salvador. To demonstrate our support for these policies we have offered to resume a modest technical assistance programme and have made available £100,000 for emergency civilian supplies under our aid programme. Outside the aid programme we have also offered places for one or two suitably qualified Salvadorean military officers at staff college courses in Britain.

ENVIRONMENT

National Park Authorities (Maps)

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the preparation of maps of moor and heath by national park authorities under section 43 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Mr. Waldegrave: National park authorities are required by section 43 of the Act to prepare and publish maps showing those areas of moor and heath within the parks which in their opinion it is particularly important to conserve. Responsibility for this work rests with the authorities concerned. However, on 30 July 1981, at column 1202, during the passage of the Bill my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) explained that we should expect the Countryside Commission to be consulted on the preparation of each map. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Wales and I have therefore invited the commission to advise us on the manner in which section 43 is being implemented.

WALES

Redundancies (Clwyd)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many redundancies have been declared in the county of Clwyd since May 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I am informed by the Manpower Services Commission that between January 1981 and September 1984, 8,838 notified redundancies occurred in Clwyd. Information at the local level for the period prior to January 1981 is not available on a comprehensive basis.

Job Creation

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of new jobs expected to be created over the next 12 months in (a) Wales and (b) in the county of Clwyd.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Available information relates to the number of manufacturing jobs expected to arise over the next three to four years from projects for which offers of selective financial assistance have been accepted and from Government factory allocations. For Wales the latest figure available as at June 1984 was 20,530. That for Clwyd was 4,300.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Mercury Communications

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when a copy of the Telecommunications licence granted to Mercury Communications will be made available.

Mr. Pattie: A copy of the Mercury licence has today been placed in the Library together with the order designating Mercury's systems as public telecommunications systems. Copies are available from the Vote Office.

Trade Mark Office

Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will report on Her Majesty's Government's efforts to secure the proposed European Community trade mark office for London; and if the information gathered by the Community Trade Mark Office Committee concerning a possible location for this institution might be of use to his Department in promoting these efforts.

Mr. Pattie: The Government emphasise their firm desire that the Community trade marks office should be located in London. They have repeatedly made their position clear to their Community partners in the past and will negotiate on the matter as soon as the opportunity arises within the appropriate Community bodies. This will depend on the progress made towards reaching agreement on the Community trade mark system as a whole. Parliamentary approval will be sought at an appropriate time for any financial support offered to secure the location of the office in London.

On the second part of the question, the Government are most appreciative of the exploratory work carried out by the Community Trade Mark Office Committee, which will be most helpful. The selection of the particular location in London, to be proposed to our Community partners, will, of course, be the responsibility of the Government, but it will be made only after considering all reasonable possibilities.

SCOTLAND

Forestry Commission

Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make a statement on the Forestry Commission's disposals programme to date.

Mr. Younger: My right hon. Friends and I have been reviewing the disposals programme in the light of proposals made to us by the Forestry Commission.

When we asked the commission to undertake this programme we stated that its main purpose was to reduce the commission's call on public funds for the management of its forestry enterprise, and some £56 million have been raised to date from the sale of assets. Recently, however, the commission has initiated major changes to its structure with a view to improving its efficiency and reshaping its management to meet future needs. Related to this, it has also reviewed its land holdings to identify those properties that are not essential to the enterprise and which might be sold as part of the rationalisation of its estate. Bearing in mind that not all such properties will find a ready market, the commission has estimated that a programme on this basis could yield some £45 million over the next four or five years. This would mean total receipts from sales from the start of the programme in 1981 of around £100 million.

Against this background, the Government have decided that the commission's disposals programme should be extended to 31 March 1989 and that its main purpose should be the rationalisation of the estate with a view to improving the commission's efficiency and the commercial effectiveness of the forestry enterprise. The commission can now plan ahead on this basis without the uncertainty and attendant difficulties that frequent reviews can cause in achieving a coherent approach to the management of the enterprise.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Viral Hepatitis

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress has been made towards implementing the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council's recommendation to extend the occupational cover for viral hepatitis.

Mr. Newton: I am pleased to announce that regulations were laid on 1 November which should benefit more people who have contracted viral hepatitis. They take effect on 3 December 1984. Employed earners who have worked in any occupation involving contact with human blood or human blood products, or who have been in contact with a source of viral hepatitis, will be covered by the regulations. Cover was previously restricted to employed earners who worked in any occupation involving close and frequent contact with human blood or human blood products, or close and frequent contact with a source of viral hepatitis infection by reason of employment in the medical treatment or nursing of a person or persons suffering from viral hepatitis or in a service ancillary to such treatment or nursing.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Students (Grants)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any detailed figures of the number of students on minimum grant who do not receive the full parental contribution.

Mr. Brooke: This information is not collected by the Department.

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received advocating the abolition of the student minimum grant.

Mr. Brooke: None.

Under-fives

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of the population aged three years or over but under five years was receiving full or part-time education at the beginning of the present school year; and how this compares with each of the last five years.

Mr. Dunn: Information for the current school year is not yet available. The percentage of children aged three and four years of age receiving full-time or part-time education in maintained schools in England in the years 1979 to 1984 were:

January	per cent.
1980	37
1981	38
1982	38
1984	40

The figures above are the numbers of pupils in schools aged three and four years at the preceding August expressed as a percentage of the total number of three and four-year-olds in the population. The figures exclude children who were four years old at the preceding August but who became five before the census day in the following January.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will list the outstanding Select Committee reports which await debate on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Biffen: There are no Select Committee reports awaiting debate for which I have undertaken to find time. As the hon. Member knows, such reports are not necessarily debated.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Family Courts

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Attorney-General if he will make available the further details of the study on family courts being undertaken by the Lord Chancellor's Department referred to in Cmnd. 9298, page 12; by whom the study is being conducted; and when a final report is expected.

The Attorney-General: An announcement about the family court review was issued in July. A copy has been placed in the Library. The study is being undertaken jointly by officials of the Lord Chancellor's Department and the Home Office with the following terms of reference:

"To examine the feasibility of the establishement of a unified court for the exclusive exercise of jurisdiction in family and domestic matters below the level of the Court of Appeal, to identify the main options for such a court and to assess the resource implications for such a court and to assess the resource implications of each of these options."

It is not yet possible to give a date for the publication of a final report.

Family Courts Conciliation Service (Bristol)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Attorney-General whether Her Majesty's Government have come to a decision as to further funding of the Bristol family courts conciliation service.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor will continue to provide funding for the Bristol courts family conciliation service until the end of the current financial year. Any decision about further funding will be taken in the light of advice given to the Lord Chancellor by the conciliation project unit which the Government intends to set up to monitor the costs and effectiveness of conciliation services.

WALES

Unemployment

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the level of unemployment in Holyhead; and if he will list the areas in Wales which have higher levels of unemployment.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I remind my hon. Friend that information of this sort is now available in the House of Commons Library.

Unoccupied Homes

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many homes remain unoccupied in Wales; what steps he is taking to remedy the situation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Local authorities' housing investment programme returns indicate that about 50,000 dwellings in all sectors were empty in Wales at April 1984.

The Welsh Office is closely involved in the exercise mentioned by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment in his answer of 30 October 1984, at columns 936-37. We will be giving careful consideration to what further action is needed in Wales in the light of the outcome.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if any members of the Forestry Commission's management structure review group, which reported in April 1982, or its headquarters and conservancy review group, which reported in January in the current year, visited the proposed site for the amalgamation of the Forestry Commission's Welsh Conservancy offices at Aberystwyth prior to any decisions to amalgamate.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: No members of either group visited Aberystwyth during the two reviews. However, both groups had members who were familiar with the situation at Aberystwyth, and the views put forward by commission staff stationed in Wales were also taken fully into account by the groups before recommendations were made.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his future practice to make available in the Library minutes of Forestry Commission meetings.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: These are internal meetings at which, among other things, the forestry commissioners discuss and formulate advice to forestry Ministers on policy matters. It would, therefore, be inappropriate for copies of the minutes of commission meetings to be placed in the Library of the House.

Education

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will express as a percentage of those pupils in full-time education aged 16 years or under yet eligible to leave at the end of the last academic year in Wales, the number who (a) left school, (b) entered Government employment and training schemes, (c) found other employment and (d) remain wholly unemployed; and if he will also give the information by county in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information is not available in the form requested. An analysis of the distribution of young people reaching minimum school leaving age is carried out on a yearly basis. The information in respect of 1984 will be available in spring 1985.

SCOTLAND

Teachers (Salaries and Conditions of Service)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will respond to the request of the Educational Institute of Scotland, and other representative bodies, for an unrestricted independent review body on teachers' salaries and other related matters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has recently met representatives of the teachers and of the employing authorities to discuss the request for an independent review of Scottish teachers' salaries. He hopes to be in a position to announce a decision shortly, taking account of these discussions and of the other representations that have been submitted to him.

Health Boards (Tenders)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the number and names of the health boards which have not yet taken effective steps to secure competitive tenders for all the ancillary services provided in the hospitals under the jurisdiction of each health board; and what steps he proposes to take on this matter.

Mr. John MacKay: Five health boards—Argyll and Clyde, Fife, Greater Glasgow, Highland and Lothian—have resolved, for the time being, not to seek competitive tenders to test the efficiency of their support services, but to secure improvements in cost-effectiveness by carrying out, with the full co-operation of their staff, intensive reviews of services. I am meeting health board chairmen on 13 November to discuss the next steps to be taken.

Nursery Places

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the number of nursery places provided by education authorities per 1,000 head of population in the region for the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The following table shows the number of children attending education authority nursery schools and classes for the years from September 1979 to September 1983 per 1,000 head of three and four year old populations.

Pupil rate per 1,000

Authority	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983

Child Abuse

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the number of cases of child abuse reported in each region in Scotland for the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not collected centrally. Each region maintains its own record of child abuse cases reported.

Borders Regional Authority

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the share of rates paid in the Borders regional authority by (a) domestic ratepayers and (b) non-domestic ratepayers for each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Ancram: The shares of rateable values attributable to—and hence of rates paid by—domestic and various other classes of ratepayer in the Borders region and its constituent districts may be obtained from part I, section 2, of "Rating Review", published by the Scottish branch of the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy and available in the House Library. The most recent edition is that of June 1984.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of total local authority revenue expenditure in the Borders regional authority was financed by (a) rate income and (b) Exchequer grant for the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Ancram: The table sets out the information based on budget information published in the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy publication "Rating Review".

	Rateborne Expenditure	Exchequer Grant
1980-81	27·3	72·3
1981-82	29·8	71·3
1982-83	30·7	71·1
1983-84	26·9	71·3
1984-85	28·8	68·5

Notes:
1. For the purpose of this question, revenue expenditure is relevant expenditure for rate support grant purposes, including loan charges.
2. Exchequer grant is specific revenue grants, and needs and resources elements of rate support grants. It excludes domestic element, which is a payment in lieu of rate income.
3. Rateborne expenditure and Exchequer grant percentages do not add up to 100 per cent. because of the creation of balances or their use to finance expenditure.

Microelectronics in Education

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is satisfied with progress being made by the committee set up to co-ordinate all aspects of microelectronics in education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: At my right hon. Friend's invitation, the Scottish Council for Educational Technology established in November 1983 a widely representative microelectronics in education committee —MEC—with a broad remit to co-ordinate all aspects of microelectronics in education and using the previously existing Scottish microelectronics development programme as its executive arm. I am satisfied that MEC has made good progress in its work and is playing a major part in achieving an integrated Scottish approach in this very important field.

Scottish Ambulance Service

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what additional resources he has made available to the Scottish ambulance service to meet the increased demand brought about by the expansion of day care services.

Mr. John MacKay: It is for the Common Services Agency for the Scottish Health Service to decide on the disposition of the resources made available to it for the ambulance service. Funds provided for the recurrent expenditure of the Scottish ambulance service doubled from £11·3 million in 1978-79 to £22·6 million (provisional) in 1983-84: expenditure for the current financial year is estimated to be about £23·6 million. I am aware that the Scottish ambulance service gives a high priority to the needs of day hospitals when considering the use to be made of development funds.

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will appoint an independent body to review the level of teachers' salaries and to make recommendations to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has recently met representatives of the teachers and of the employing authorities to discuss the request for an independent review of Scottish teachers' salaries. He hopes to be in a position to announce a decision shortly, taking account of these discussions and of the other representations that have been submitted to him.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Kilbrandon Inquiry (Recommendations)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to carry out the recommendations of the Kilbrandon inquiry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I have noted with interest the publication on 1 November of the report of the independent inquiry under Lord Kilbrandon. The report is one of a number of interesting documents which have been published in recent months representing different views and outlooks. I welcome the concern expressed in all these documents to find a way forward for Northern Ireland. This can only be achieved if any proposals which are made are practical and likely to be broadly acceptable to all those committed to constitutional and peaceful progress. The proposals in the Kilbrandon report and in other published documents need to be seen against this background as talks continue between those involved in Northern Ireland in the period ahead.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he intends to set up an inquiry on his Department's responses to the famine in Ethiopia and the lessons learnt by his Department in handling the crisis.

Mr. Raison: I see no need for an inquiry. The Department has responded most efficiently to the demands placed on it. But there are always lessons to be learnt.

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his Department is currently doing to assist the relief of famine in Ethiopia; and if he is satisfied with the current programmes.

Mr. Raison: Over £3 million of the £5 million I announced recently has now been allotted to help expand the feeding efforts of the voluntary agencies, to strengthen the Ethiopian transport fleet, and to reinforce the work of the International Committee of the Red Cross. Our 6,500 tonnes food aid should be shipped within a fortnight. The problems are very great, but together with substantial new aid we have just agreed in the European Community I believe this will make a real impact on the crisis.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will list the amount of aid given to Ethiopia over each of the past five years, distinguishing between food aid and money aid.

Mr. Raison: The figures for aid to the Ethiopian Government are as follows:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983
Food aid	1,021	1,091	22	5,194	2,510
Other aid*	1,742	478	144	106	527
TOTAL	2,763	1,569	166	5,300	3,037

* This includes development loans and grants, disaster relief and technical co-operation, but excludes aid channelled through the European Community, the World Food Programme and other multilateral agencies.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures he will take to assist Ethiopia over the next year.

Mr. Raison: Our first task must be to spend to best effect the £5 million already allotted to Ethiopia and other drought-stricken African countries, and the £35 million supplementary aid now decided upon by the European Community of which we pay about a fifth. This will take us well into next year. I shall then review what more we might do.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the amount of aid given to Ethiopia from the contingency fund.

Mr. Raison: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced to the House on 24 October, £5 million has been allocated from the aid programme contingency reserve for Ethiopia and other African countries affected by the drought and famine. The bulk of this will be spent on Ethiopia. In addition, £1·4 million has been allocated to the purchase and transport costs of food aid for Ethiopia; and the United Kingdom's share of the allocations from the European Community budget for additional food and other emergency aid will be attributed to the aid programme. The United Kingdom's share in relation to Ethiopia is some £2 million, but it is not yet known how much of this will be spent this financial year.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will state the conditions tied to aid given to Ethiopia over the last five years.

Mr. Raison: Nearly all aid given or promised to Ethiopia during the last five years has been humanitarian or food aid. Part of the food aid is channelled through the World Food Programme. This has not carried any conditions imposed at our instance. Our recent agreement to forgive future repayments due on past aid loans is unconditional. Technical co-operation provided or promised is, as usual, tied to British sources. Aid by the European Community, to which we have subscribed our share, has been given in accordance with the Lomé convention and the Community's regulations governing food aid and disaster or emergency assistance.

Nicaragua

Mr. Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, following the general election in Nicaragua, he will enter into negotiations with its Government for a renewal and increase in the British aid programme to that country.

Mr. Raison: The British bilateral aid programme to Nicaragua is limited to the provision of a small number of scholarships in the United Kingdom, support for small development projects co-financed with British voluntary agencies, and for Nicaraguan refugees and displaced persons through contributions to the International Committee of the Red Cross and the United Nations High Commission for Refugees. Her Majesty's Government have no plans at present to increase this level of assistance.

Aid Budget

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the items in the aid budget which have been reduced in order to increase the amount of aid given to Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: The measures announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 24 October will be met from the aid programme's contingency reserve which exists to deal with just such situations. Existing commitments will not be affected.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the level of the contingency fund within the aid budget at the beginning of the financial year and at present.

Mr. Raison: It is not the practice to reveal the contingency element within the aid budget, for reasons indicated in the reply to the first report from the Foreign Affairs Committee (1983-84)—Cmnd. 9367, page 8.

Famine Relief

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to respond to possible famines in areas other than Ethiopia over the next year.

Mr. Raison: The UN agencies concerned are predicting that many countries, particularly in Africa, will need emergency food aid in 1985. I urged my European Community colleagues on 6 November to give priority in the 1985 EC food aid programme to meeting these needs, and we shall do the same in our own bilateral food aid programme. The EC also has some £65 million from the emergency provision in the European development fund to draw on in 1985, and there is a contingency provision within our own aid programme for allocation as required.

UNESCO

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's policy concerning United Kingdom membership of UNESCO.

Mr. Raison: I am currently reviewing British policy towards UNESCO with my colleagues in the light of developments in the organisation this year.

IMF (Annual Meeting)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why, at the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund, the proposal of the World Bank to set up a special fund to help deal with the problems facing people in sub-Saharan Africa was opposed by Her Majesty's Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The World Bank made no such proposal. Its management is currently seeking general reactions to its diagnosis of the problems and prescriptions for change in sub-Saharan Africa, and will be meeting officials from my Department later this month.

International Development Association

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans Her Majesty's Government have to increase the funding of the International Development Association; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: Although we indicated our willingness to subscribe to supplementary funding for the general resources of IDA, no such scheme is now being pursued. A further opportunity may occur when donors formally review IDA's resources next year.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Company Profitability

Mr. Jim Spicer asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the recent trend in company profitability.

Mr. Peter Rees: Latest estimates show that the real rate of return to non-North sea industrial and commercial companies has risen from 3·4 per cent. in 1981 to 5·8 per cent. in 1983—the best return since the peak of the previous profitability cycle in 1978. For all industrial and commercial companies, including those operating in the North sea, the rate of return increased from 6·5 per cent. in 1981 to 10 per cent. in 1983. Profits have continued to increase in 1984, suggesting that the upward trend is continuing.

Third World Countries (Assistance)

Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he will be making to the meeting of the World Bank's development committee to be held early in 1985 aimed at assisting the poorest Third world countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: It has been agreed that the development committee and the interim committee will give special attention to a range of international financial issues of particular concern to developing countries in the spring of 1985. The precise terms of the agenda and other arrangements have not yet been settled, but my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer intends to play a constructive part in the discussions.

Developing Countries (Lever Report)

Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer which of the recommendations of the Lever report on the debt problems of developing countries he finds acceptable; what plans he has to act on the report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I support the Lever report's concern about sustaining non-inflationary financial flows to developing countries, particularly by means of direct investment. I expect my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to discuss these issues at the special sessions of the interim and development committees next spring.

Civil Service

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present size of the Civil Service; by how many the establishment has been reduced since April 1979; and what categories of staff have suffered the biggest reductions.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Corbett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report the amount of value added tax paid since 1 May to the latest convenient date in respect of hot food and drink purchased from take-aways.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Government Departments (Long-term Planning)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what expansion in individual Government Departments occurred in the manpower engaged in long-term planning after the abolition of the Central Policy Review staff.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information is not available centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Unemployed Persons

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Prime Minister what information she possesses from the 1981 census of Britain of the number and percentage of unemployed in Britain by social class.

The Prime Minister: The information requested is as follows.

The census includes as "out of employment" those persons who—in the week before the census—were either seeking work, prevented from seeking work by temporary sickness, or waiting to take up a job already accepted. The social classification used in the census is based on the occupation of those persons in employment and on the previous occupation of those out of employment. The economically active include both those in employment and those out of employment.

Social class as defined for census tabulation	Economically active	Out of employment	Percentage of those out of employment who were in each social class	Percentage in social class who were out of employment*
All persons age 16 and over	25,405,590	2,489,400	100	9·8
I. Professional, etc. occupations	948,660	24,050	1	2·5
II. Intermediate occupations	5,313,790	176,210	7·1	3·3
III. (N) Skilled occupations	5,554,870	245,120	9·8	4·4
III. (M) Skilled occupations—manual	6,173,040	596,400	24·0	9·7
Partly skilled occupations	4,582,690	440,570	17·7	9·6
Unskilled occupations	1,613,340	244,180	9·8	15·1
Inadequately described, never previously occupied or previously employed in the armed forces	1,219,200	762,870	30·6	62·6

* Percentage of the economically active.

Government Services (Post Office Corporation)

Mr. Spearing asked the Prime Minister how far, and in what way, the convenience and cost to the citizen is taken into account when considering the most cost effective way of delivering Government services which could be provided by the counter services of the Post Office Corporation.

The Prime Minister: These factors are among a number which are taken fully into account.

"London Gazette" (Honours)

Mr. Leighton asked the Prime Minister if she will provide the London Gazette publication dates of the announcements of lists of major United Kingdom Civil Division honours, other than New Year's and Birthday honours, since 1964.

The Prime Minister: The information is as follows:

Resignation lists
27 November 1964
4 August 1970
2 April 1974
1 June 1976
12 June 1979

Dissolution lists
13 May 1966
5 December 1974
21 July 1983

Others
3 July 1969 (The Investiture of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales)
8 October 1982 (South Atlantic)

There are numerous other honours awarded in the Civil Division but these relate often to only a few individuals at a time. Examples are those in the Victorian Order conferred by Her Majesty, honours conferred on Governors General and the Lord Mayors of London.

There are also regular lists of gallantry awards and imperial service medals.

Housing Expenditure

Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister what representations she has received in the past two weeks regarding any reduction in public expenditure on housing for the forthcoming financial year.

The Prime Minister: I have received about 15 such representations in the past two weeks.

Council of Europe

Mr. Eggar asked the Prime Minister what changes have been made in the composition of the United Kingdom delegation to the parliamentary assembly of the Council of Europe.

The Prime Minister: I have made the following appointments:

Representatives

I have appointed the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Johnston) in place of the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross).

Substitutes

I have appointed my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir Biggs-Davison) in place of my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell), and the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) in place of the Lord McNair.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement as to the costs to date in policing the National Union of Mineworkers' dispute in Leicestershire.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Leicestershire police calculate that the additional cost of policing the miners' dispute in the county up to 25 August, the latest date for which information is available, was about £9·045 million.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how much money is to be provided to Leicestershire police committee, and when, to enable payment to the other local authorities which provided police during the current National Union of Mineworkers' dispute;

(2) if he will provide details of the amounts to be contributed towards the costs of policing the current mining dispute to date (a) in Leicestershire and (b) in the remaining areas of the east midlands.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend announced on 9 October that no police authority would have to bear from the rates as a result of the miners' dispute more than the product of 0·75 penny rate. In Leicestershire this is £882,000 and the costs falling on the police authority have already reached this level. All remaining approved additional costs will be met by the Government. The authority has sought and received advances of police grant and of the special payment which he is making totalling £7·479 million to meet, among other costs, the costs of police authorities whose forces have provided assistance to the Leicestershire police. The contribution which other police authorities in the east midlands will receive from the Government towards their expenditure resulting from the dispute in their own area will depend on the amount of that expenditure. For example, in Nottinghamshire the Government are meeting all approved additional costs over £958,000.

Remand System

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of state for the Home Department what plans he has to change the remand system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend intends to seek power in the Prosecution of Offences Bill to apply time limits to the preliminary stages of criminal proceedings. These would have the effect of restricting the period for which an accused may be remanded in custody. He would exercise this power only after considering the results of field trials held to test the feasibility and practical implications of particular time limits.

Hare Coursing

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce legislation for the purpose of outlawing hare coursing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: None. The Government regard this as a matter for individual conscience and decision.

Firearms Act 1968

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ensure, in his proposed revised memorandum of guidance to the police on the administration of the Firearms Act 1968, that all holders of firearms certificates for the use of rifles for vermin control will not be in breach of condition if they test fire their rifles where their use for vermin control is permitted.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We are still considering the advice to be provided on this subject in the revised memorandum.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, following its incorporation into the 1973 Green Paper "The Control of Firearms in Great Britain" (Cmnd. 5297) and the recent report of the working party on the administration of the Firearms Act 1968, dated April 1984, he will make available in the Library Sir John McKay's working party report of 1972 into the administration of the Firearms Act 1968.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. The report on Sir John McKay's working party was an internal one.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the administration of the Firearms Act 1968 by chiefs of police; and if he proposes to initiate legislative reforms with a view to making cost savings and standardising procedures.

Mr. Giles Shaw: We have no plans to introduce such legislation.

Nursing Homes (Prosecutions)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been brought against private residential nursing homes in the past 12 months by public, professional or governmental bodies; and how this compares with the previous 12 months.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authorities (Capital Receipts)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total amount of capital receipts which local authorities have been required not to spend as a result of his announcement of 18 July.

Mr. Waldegrave: On 18 July, my right hon. Friend asked local authorities to exercise restraint in their capital expenditure in 1984-85. The effect on capital receipts accumulated in previous years cannot be deduced from information held centrally. Under the terms of the request, local authorities remain free to spend up to the level of their capital allocations, plus the prescribed proportion of capital receipts in the year, or to the level of their contractual commitments on 18 July, whichever is the higher.

Town and Country Planning Act 1971

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to review section 169 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971.

Mr. Macfarlane: The section is already under review.

Access to the Countryside

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will detail the bodies concerned with access to the countryside which are currently in receipt of a grant from his Department; if he will state each grant being paid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Apart from the Department's grant-in-aid to the Countryside Commission, which gives financial support to certain bodies concerned with access to the countryside, some of the grants awarded by the Department under its special grant programme go to voluntary bodies with similar concerns. In the current year these are as follows:

Organisation	Amount of Grant £
British Trust for Conservation Volunteers	100,000
Byways and Bridleways Trust	4,000
Conservation Trust	8,250
Council for National Parks	7,620
Inter-Action—Country Wings	20,810
Kennet and Avon Canal Trust	5,000
Open Spaces Society	4,500
Royal Society for Nature Conservation	41,135
Rural Preservation Association	11,536

Housing (Expenditure)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now make a statement on the Government's intention regarding public expenditure on housing for the forthcoming financial year.

Mr. Gow: A statement will be made shortly.

Rates

Mr. Gary Waller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his forthcoming announcement on a general domestic rating revaluation will be accompanied by the consultation document referred to in the White Paper "Rates", Cmnd. 9008.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I ask my hon. Friend to await the announcement.

Housing

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many homes exist with outside water closets only.

Sir George Young: The most recent estimate available appears in table 1 of the "English House Condition Survey 1981, Part 1", a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the annual change in public expenditure on housing in each of the past five years in (a) current prices and (b) constant prices.

Sir George Young: Details of public expenditure on housing for each year since 1978-79, in both cash and cost terms, are set out in the public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 9143) in table 2.7 and table 1.14, respectively.

Council Properties (Sales)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the amount of capital receipts from the sales of property in each of the past three years by local authorities; and what proportion has been spent on housing.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following is the available information:

Local Authority Capital Receipts from Sales of Fixed Assets—all services—England

1981-82	998
1982-83	1,592
1983-84	1,548

Source: Local authority capital payments returns. Information on how these receipts have been used is not available.

TRANSPORT

Marine Pilots

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will make a statement on the draft final report on the early retirement proposals for United Kingdom marine pilots.

Mr. David Mitchell: I hope it will be possible to make a statement fairly soon.

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has completed the consultation with the main interested parties following the publication of the Samuel Montagu report on the early retirement of marine pilots published in April 1984.

Mr. David Mitchell: Yes. I am giving careful consideration to the options that are open.

Driving Licences (Loss)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will change the prevailing 10-year rule so that licence holders who mislay their driving licence do not have to resit their driving test if they cannot prove they have held one during the last 10 years.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This is under consideration. If a change is feasible, it will be made when a convenient legislative opportunity occurs.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Montgomery asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current state of negotiations between the United Kingdom and French Departments of Transport over the Channel tunnel project.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend will be meeting the French Minister of Transport next week to consider what the next steps for the two Governments should be if financing proposals meeting the conditions set out in the Secretary of State's statement of 22 May are submitted by potential promoting groups.

Midland Link Motorways

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the progress of investigations on the parapet rails of the elevated sections of Midland link motorways.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We have undertaken the investigations into the effects of waterborne de-icing salts on the concrete elements of the parapet. We are now satisfied that we can put in hand the parapet rail repairs and work is proceeding.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the final cost of the bearing replacement work on the Bromford viaduct of the Midland link motorways; and how this compares with the estimate.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Although work on the final contract for the replacement of the bearing plinths is complete, we do not yet have the contractor's final account. My Department has been advised that the estimated final contract cost is £818,000 but this may be varied and I am still awaiting further information from my agents, West Midlands county council, from whom I require a full financial statement. This matter is being pursued vigorously by my Department. The tender sum was £509,793.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the effectiveness of the replacement bearings on the elevated sections of the Midland link motorways; and how this is measured.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No bearings have been replaced. We have replaced bearing plinths on the elevated sections of the midland links and they are, and will continue to be, subject to regular inspections. The effectiveness of the replaced plinths will be judged on their durability. So far there is no evidence of any of the defects which affected the previous plinths.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the effectiveness of the new grouts used on the bearing plinths of the elevated sections of Midland link motorways; and how this is measured.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The new grouts are subject to regular inspections, and their effectiveness will be judged on their durability. So far there is no evidence of any of the defects which affected the previous grouts.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the contracts let for work on the plinths and bearings on the elevated sections of Midland link motorways.

Mr. Michael Spicer: There have been no contracts for bearing replacement. The following contracts have been let for work on plinths:

Airports (Expansion)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to encourage the expansion of Manchester international airport and other airports outside the south-east region.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer the hon. Member to the statement I made on 26 October, at columns 982-86, arising from the Adjournment debate raised by my hon. Friend the member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), in which I explained the ways in which this Government have encouraged, and will continue to encourage, the development of regional airports, and in particular Manchester international airport.

Bus Policy

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of the total public stage-carriage bus mileage in England and Wales is represented by the bus mileage encompassed in the experiments in Hereford and Worcester, on which he has based his recommendations for changes to bus licensing, deregulation and competition policies; and if he is satisfied with the breadth of this experimentation as a basis for change.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is not correct to say that our recommended changes to bus licensing, deregulation and competition policies are based upon the trial area in Hereford and Worcester, which accounts for some 0·15 per cent. of stage carriage bus mileage in England and Wales.

EMPLOYMENT

Trade Unions (Closed Shop)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many trades unions have held ballots, as provided for under section 3 of the Employment Act 1982, to confirm or otherwise the continuance of closed shops in places of employment where they represent employees.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many ballots on the continuance of closed shop arrangements have been held since 1982; and with what results

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There is no requirement in the Employment Act 1982 to notify this Department of any secret ballots which are held to determine whether closed shops have the support of the employees they cover. Of those ballots reported in the press, the results of three, covering a total of 2,731 employees, have been against continuance of the closed shop, and two, covering a total of 446 employees, in favour.

Manufacturing and Service Industries (Report)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Employment what action he proposes to take on the manufacturing and service industries 1983 report of the Health and Safety Inspectorate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The manufacturing and service industries 1983 report records activity during the year by Her Majesty's factory inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive. It also sets out some of the inspectorate's current concerns and priorities.

In 1984 the inspectorate has continued its programme of assessment-based pre-emptive inspections to all sizes and types of premises. It has also undertaken targeted initiatives, either in respect of problems in particular industries or of widespread hazards, such as the effects of excessive noise and the failure to wear head protection in construction. It has continued its reactive work by investigating accidents and complaints and by giving advice.

I am satisfied that the inspectorate continues to allocate its resources on the basis of evaluation of competing priorities. It is the responsibility of all employers to see that their employees and the public are not put at risk by work activities; the duty of suppliers of articles and substances to see that these are safe; and it is for work people to co-operate in measures to prevent accidents and injury to health.

"Training for Jobs"

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will write to the Manpower Services Commission stating whether his letter of 17 September about the implementation of "Training for Jobs" was a directive under the Employment and Training Act 1973.

Mr. Tom King: No. My letter to Manpower Services Commissioners of 17 September was a specific request that the commission's corporate plan for the period 1985-88 would need to include plans for the expenditure of the additional resources for non-advanced further education made available to the commission as announced in the White Paper "Training for Jobs" (Cmd. 9135).

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the status of his letter to the Manpower Services Commission of 17 September containing the implementation of "Training for Jobs".

Mr. Tom King: My letter to Manpower Services Commissioners of 17 September was a specific request that the commission's corporate plan for the period 1985-88 would need to include plans for the expenditure of the additional resources for non-advanced further education made available to the commission as announced in the White Paper "Training for Jobs" (Cmnd. 9135).

Young Workers Scheme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current numbers of participants on the young workers scheme at the different levels of subsidy to their employers.

Mr. Alan Clark: Under the current young workers scheme, the payment to employers for jobs which qualify for support is £15 per week. The payment for jobs which were accepted for support before 1 April 1984, when the rules of the scheme were changed, is either £15 or £7·50 a week, depending upon the level of the young person's gross weekly earnings. On 28 September, the latest date for which information is available, 70,000 jobs were supported. A detailed breakdown could be provided only at disproportionate cost, but it is estimated that about 7 per cent. are at the lower level of support.

Training and Employment

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current, future, projected and previous numbers of participants in total and by region in the various training and employment measures run by the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Community Programme

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) to what extent the recent rule changes in the community programme will have the effect of maximising the impact of the scheme on the number of registered long-term unemployed rather than any long-term unemployment as such;

(2) what assessments he made of the effect of the recent rule changes in the community programme on unemployed women before their introduction;

(3) what reductions there were to the number of people eligible for the community programme as a result of recent rule changes.

Mr. Peter Morrison: As my right hon. Friend explained in his statement on 30 July, at columns 121-22, the recent changes to the community programme were intended to improve the prospects of resettling long-term unemployed people into regular jobs, help sponsors in the management of projects and ensure that places on the programme go to those most in need. They were introduced after careful assessment of their effects on both men and women and should improve the programme's use of taxpayers' money.

The number who will be affected by the decision to give priority to those people who meet the programme's criteria for long-term unemployment and are also benefit recipients will vary according to changing personal and family circumstances. We have provided that where benefit is claimed by a head of household and includes an element of payment for an unemployed spouse, that spouse will be regarded as a benefit recipient. As a result, some non-claimants and some included in the monthly count of the unemployed because they claim national insurance credits but not benefits will remain eligible for the programme, providing the other conditions for participation are also met.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of women employed on the Manpower Services Commission community programme; what percentage of the current total community programme work force are women; and, of those, how many were in receipt of benefit before joining the scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in Merseyside he envisages will be affected by the proposed change in the eligibility conditions for the Government's community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: No changes in eligibility criteria for the community programme are currently proposed following those announced by my right hon. Friend in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder) on 30 July, at columns 121-22, and introduced from 1 October.

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in Merseyside are presently covered by Her Majesty's Government's community programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: On 31 October 1984, 5,476 people were employed on the community programme in Merseyside. Merseyside residents may also travel to work on community programme projects mounted outside the area.

Information Technology Centres

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take the opportunity of International Youth Year to extend the Manpower Services Commission's information technology centres programme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Our original pilot information technology centre programme launched in 1981 was intended to fund 20 centres. The programme has been so successful that we have now established over 150 centres, and our current plans are to expand the programme to 175 centres.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment which Manpower Services Commission information technology centres currently receive topping up grants from the Department of Trade and Industry, listed by name and region.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Those information technology centres currently in receipt of funding from the Department of Trade and Industry are as follows:

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people are currently receiving training in information technology centres which get top up grants from the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Peter Morrison: At the end of September 1984 some 4,770 young people were being trained in information technology centres which are currently in receipt of funding from the Department of Trade and Industry. All these centres, of course, also receive substantial funding from the Manpower Services Commission for training provided under the youth training scheme.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has consulted the information technology centres on their views on the impending withdrawal of topping up grants.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Information technology centre sponsors and managers have been advised from the outset that the funding from the Department of Trade and Industry was for pump-priming purposes for a limited period only. As, however, I announced in my reply of 7 November 1984, at columns 2-3, to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), I have agreed that the Manpower Services Commission should provide any necessary additional salary support for centres' specialist adult staff for the period until 31 October 1985 for those centres whose funding from the Department of Trade and Industry comes to an end. This, of course, is additional to the normal funding which the commission make to centres for training provided under the youth training scheme.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take steps to ensure that the information technology centres receive sufficient funds to continue their role as training grounds for new technology.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 7 November 1984, at columns 2-3, to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale).

Labour Statistics

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of women unemployed for more than 12 months; and what percentage of those unemployed for over 12 months are women.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information about the number of unemployed females claiming benefit is in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of those women unemployed for 12 months or more, are in receipt of either unemployment, supplementary, sickness or invalidity benefit.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information in the precise form requested is not available. The available information comes from the 1983 labour force survey which estimates that in the second quarter of 1983 some 360,000 women in Great Britain had been looking for work for 12 months or more, of whom 210,000—about 60 per cent.—were claiming either unemployment benefit, supplementary allowance as an unemployed person, or national insurance credits.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the number of women who are unemployed but not registered as such.

Mr. Alan Clark: The labour force survey estimates that in the second quarter of 1983, the latest date for which estimates are available, some 540,000 women in Great Britain were seeking work but were not claiming unemployment benefits. This figure, however, includes some 100,000 women who were students or on Government training schemes and who would not be described as unemployed. The survey also showed that an estimated 320,000 women included in the claimant count were not actively seeking work in the previous week.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Limited Partnerships (Research and Development)

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what studies the Government are making to review the law governing limited partnership with a view to facilitating the system for the financing of research and development projects.

Mr. Fletcher: None. If my hon. Friend has suggestions as to how the Limited Partnerships Act 1907 could be amended to facilitate the financing of research and development projects, I would be happy to study them.

Trading Discounts

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the review of trading discounts allowed retailers by manufacturers to be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: The Director General of Fair Trading is undertaking a fact finding exercise aimed at updating some of the statistical information in the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on discounts to retailers. He is unlikely to be in a position to publish the full results of this exercise until well into next year.

Coles Cranes, Sunderland

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will seek an assurance from the Kidde Corporation that it will continue primary crane manufacture as well as assembly at Coles Cranes in Sunderland;

(2) if he will seek an assurance from the Kidde Corporation that Coles Cranes will continue to compete in all its existing international markets and, in particular, in Australia, India and the far east;

(3) if he will seek an assurance from the Kidde Corporation that it will continue mobile crane research and development at Coles Cranes in Sunderland.

Mr. Fletcher: I have received assurances from the Grove division of Kidde Corporation that Grove intends to continue the manufacture of cranes in Sunderland and to develop Coles' operations in world markets.

Privatisation (Fees)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list what advisory or consultancy fees have been arranged with companies advising his Department on aspects of the privatisation of Jaguar Cars and British Telecom.

Mr. Pattie: No. It is not the practice to disclose the value of individual contracts between the Department and its consultants and advisers.

Liquidations and Bankruptcies

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the most recent available figures on company liquidations and personal bankruptcies.

Mr. Fletcher: Monthly figures up to September were published in British Business, 19 October, and further detail in the quarterly article on 26 October. Table 2 of the latter article gives the division of bankruptcies between the self-employed and other individuals.

Information Technology Centres

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to change the current arrangements for support to information technology centres from his Department.

Mr. Fletcher: My right hon. Friend has no plans to change the current arrangements for support to information technology centres from my Department. A total of 175 ITeCs will receive pump-priming grants totalling £75,000 over their first three years from the Department.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the current level of support to information technology centres; how this has changed over the last three years; and what further changes are projected in the level of support.

Mr. Fletcher: The Department provides a pump-priming grant of £75,000 to each ITeC over its first three years. Initially, the Department had agreed to provide pump-priming grants of £55,000 per ITeC over their first two years, but in 1983 the Department agreed a further third year's grant of £20,000 to facilitate open access. No further changes are projected in the level of DTI support for ITeCs.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the information technology centres by name, location and current number of trainees which receive financial support from his Department.

Mr. Fletcher: The following list contains a total of 167 ITeCs which have been approved for funding by the Department to date. Eight ITeCs have already received the full DTI grant of £75,000, 149 are currently receiving that grant, and a further 10 will be receiving DTI grants over the next three years. In addition, a further eight ITeC locations have yet to be approved for departmental funding to bring the total number to 175. Indicated on the list is the number of approved training places for those centres. I understand that the current number of trainees in place is available from the Department of Employment.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to propose more favourable terms for Third world producers under the new multi-fibre arrangement currently being negotiated; if these will include the exemption of the poorest countries from quota restrictions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The GATT secretariat has produced a study on "Textiles and Clothing in the World Economy" at the request of the GATT council in order to assist discussion. A copy of this study has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. We have also commissioned a report from Professor Silberston of Imperial College on the implications for the United Kingdom economy of international trading policies affecting textiles and clothing, which is due to be published in December. These studies will assist in our policy deliberations, which will cover such issues as those posed in the hon. Member's question.

Life Insurance Policies (Surrender Values)

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to require life insurance companies to quote approximate surrender values for years prior to maturity of a policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: The statutory "cooling off" notices, under section 75 of the Insurance Companies Act 1982, warn that surrender values may be less than premiums paid, particularly in the early years of a life policy, and that some life policies do not have a surrender value. Moreover, the life insurance industry's statement of long-term insurance practice also provides, amongst other things, for a warning to similar effect being included in appropriate sales literature, as well as for life insurance documents indicating the rights to surrender values in a contract.

I have no plans for further legislative action.

Trade Liberalisation

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to propose, under the auspicies of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, a new round of trade liberalisation talks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: The London economic summit in June referred to the important contribution which a new round of multilateral trade negotiations would make to strengthening the open multilateral trading system. The United Kingdom will continue to work through the European Community for a properly prepared new round. But it will be necessary to secure the willing and effective participation of GATT contracting parties as a whole.

DEFENCE

Tornado Crash (Italy)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what report he has had on the reasons for the crash of the Italian Tornado on 23 July, which left Gioia del Colle base, in Puglia. south east Italy and flew north west to the area of Muglia, near Castel del Monte.

Mr. Lee: As I told the hon. Gentleman on 1 August, at columns 281-82, there is a continual exchange of flight safety information among the three nations which operate the Tornado aircraft. However, the release of information on the outcome of investigations into the accident on 23 July is a matter for the Italian authorities.

Nuclear Winter Theory

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Defence why his Department declined an invitation to take part in discussions about the nuclear winter theory; whether he has received documents on the subject from the organisers of the discussions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I assume the hon. Gentleman is referring to the current tour organised by the so-called "Nuclear Free Zone Local Authorities" and "Scientists Against Nuclear Arms". My right hon. Friend has received the same invitation to a briefing session on the nuclear winter hypothesis as that believed to have been sent to right hon. and hon. Members generally. The Department is following this aspect of the nuclear debate and attendance is considered unnecessary.

RAF Finningley (Transfer of Operations)

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to transfer operations from RAF Finningley to RAF Binbrook; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: It has been known for some time that RAF Finningley could be affected by National Coal Board mining operations, and the implications of this are being studied. The study is still in progress and it is too early to say whether some of Finningley's tasks might be transferred to RAF Binbrook.

RAF Basic Trainer (Contract)

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish a table showing how each of the four short-listed contenders for the new Royal Air Force basic trainer contract match up to the air staff target specifications; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: No. The normal procedures will be followed in which full consideration will be given to the detailed capabilities of each contender. It is not the practice to publish any such comparisons since the information is commercially confidential.

Low-flying Aircraft (Gwynedd)

Mr. D.E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any exercises involving low-flying aircraft over Gwynedd have been conducted by units of the United States air force in Europe.

Mr. Stanley: There have been no major low-flying exercises involving aircraft of the United States air force over Gwynedd this year. However, day-to-day routine training of USAF aircraft based in the United Kingdom includes low-level overflights of most parts of the country, including Gwynedd.

Expenditure Guidelines

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied that each of the services is operating within the expenditure guidelines laid down for the current financial year.

Mr. Stanley: The defence cash limit is set for our expenditure as a whole and is not calculated separately for each service. Equally, our management of cash expenditure is conducted against Votes, and not by service. Defence expenditure for 1984-85 is expected to be contained within the cash limit.

Greenham Common

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the hijacking of a service bus and car at RAF Greenham common and the driving of these vehicles into the base during the weekend of 2-3 November.

Mr. Stanley: On 1 November three out of six women who had been detected as trespassers attempted to drive away a USAF vehicle. They were prevented from doing so and were later removed from the base. On 4 November a group of women who had trespassed on to the base took a bus, which had been parked temporarily outside its secure compound, and drove to the cruise missile facility. They were seen, followed and detained by United Kingdom security personnel. Three have been charged with criminal damage and 18 with offences connected with the taking of the bus.

HMS Conquerer (Log Book)

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the circumstances of the loss of the log book of HMS Conqueror for the period around the dates of the sinking of the General Belgrano

Mr. Heseltine: I made such a statement on 7 November 1984, at column 106.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Law of the Sea (Convention)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether it is Her Majesty's Government's intention to sign the convention on the law of the sea on or before 9 December and to ratify the treaty thereafter.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have as yet taken no final decision. We remain in touch with other European countries which have not signed the convention.

Lisbon Agreement

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further progress has been made between Her Majesty's Government and the Spanish Government on the implementation of the Lisbon agreement which was signed on 10 April 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Since my last meeting with the Spanish Foreign Minister in New York on 25 September, when we reviewed the discussions which had taken place at official level, diplomatic contacts have continued. I expect to meet the Spanish Foreign Minister again soon. It remains our aim to achieve the earliest possible implementation of the Lisbon statement, which provides the best framework for managing our differences with Spain over Gibraltar.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reply he has sent to Mr. Colin Smith, of the Independent Falklands Farmers, about their petition against further agreements being signed by the Coalite Company.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No such petition has been received.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his discussions with Lord Shackleton and Mr. Michael Gregory, lawyer of the Country landowners' Association, about the Falkland Islands Company leasing policy.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No such discussions have been held. This is primarily a matter for the Falkland Islands Company and the Falkland Islands Government.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will invite Mr. Eric Varley, chairman of Coalite, to discuss Coalite's policy towards land reform in the Falklands.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no plans at present to do so, although we are naturally in regular contact with Coalite and the Falkland Islands Company about matters concerning the Falkland Islands. Coalite's policy towards land reform in the Falklands is, however, primarily a matter for Coalite and the Falkland Islands Government.

British Embassies (Foreign Nationals)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the seven locations where foreign citizens sought sanctuary in a British high commission, or one of Her Majesty's embassies or consulates in recent years.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) told the hon. Member on 29 October, it would not be in the public interest for me to give more details of the seven recorded occasions of foreign citizens seeking sanctuary in our missions abroad.

Central and South America

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has for increasing the United Kingdom's diplomatic representation in Central and South America; whether he has any proposals to withdraw or reduce the United Kingdom's representation in these areas; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The level of diplomatic representation in Central and South America, as elsewhere in the world, is kept under constant review in the light of the requirements and the resources available.

Father Popieluszko

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Polish Government following the murder of Father Popieluszko; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: The murder of Father Popieluszko is a tragedy for Poland and for all who seek national reconciliation. The Polish authorities are continuing their investigations into the crime and have already made arrests. In these circumstances, the question of making representations to the Polish Government are not necessary.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

EC (Surpluses)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many days' supply is represented by products currently in surplus in the European Community.

Mr. Jopling: According to the latest available figures stock levels in the Community are as follows:

Commodity	Date	Days' Supply Public Storage	Days' Supply Assisted Private Storage
Cheese	25 October 1984	—	11
Butter	25 October 1984	237	47
Skimmed Milk Powder	25 October 1984	154	—

Barley	25 October 1984	15	—
Rye	25 October 1984	51	—
Durum	25 October 1984	82	—
Beef	30 September 1984	27	—
Beef	26 October 1984	—	5
Pigmeat	31 August 1984	—	2
Olive Oil	31 October 1984	34	—
Oil Seeds	31 October 1984	2	—
Sugar	7 November 1984	2	—
Wine	31 August 1984	—	83
Dried Grapes	8 November 1984	—	65
Figs	8 November 1984	—	44

Whisky

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what sanctions are available through the European Economic Community to prevent whisky being sold in European Economic Community countries at higher prices than equivalent spirits in public bars and restaurants.

Mrs. Fenner: None. Discriminatory taxation of spirit drinks is forbidden under article 95 of the treaty of Rome, but fixing retail prices for alcoholic drinks is a matter solely for commercial decision.

ENERGY

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the value of irretrievable machinery and equipment and the amount of coal not mined from the 20 working faces and eight salvage faces which have been lost to date during the current miners' dispute.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand from the National Coal Board that 20 working faces have been lost at the following collieries:

Castlehill
Polkemmet
Merton
Fryston
Hatfield
Rossington
Bentley
Highgate
Shirebrook
Markham (Derbyshire)
Tilmanstone
Bold
Penrikyber
Bedwas
Celynen South
St. Johns

Eight salvage faces have been lost at the following collieries:

Barony
Merton
Ackton Hall
Markham (Yorkshire)
Bullcliffe Wood
Houghton
Shirebrook

Questions about the financial and production losses arising from the loss of the faces are matters for the National Coal Board.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy, of the 20 working faces which have been lost during the current miners' dispute, how many had benefited from Her Majesty's Government's capital investment programme; and if he will give the amount involved, a list of the collieries involved and the expected life of the mines.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I have given him today in which I indicated the collieries at which 20 working faces and eight salvage faces have been lost so far during the dispute.

The National Coal Board has benefited from massive investment, totalling £3·9 billion in the first five years of this Government. The detailed breakdown of this investment is a matter for the NCB. It is regrettable that any part of this major investment effort should be lost through the NUM's needless continuation of this damaging dispute.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy, of the further 84 coal faces causing concern to the National Coal Board, how many collieries are involved; and what is the amount of capital investment at risk.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand from the National Coal Board that there are faces currently causing the board concern at about 50 collieries.

Concessionary Coal

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the amount of concessionary coal delivered to striking miners to date; and whether it is secured from opencast operations.

Mr. David Hunt: The supply of concessionary coal to its employees is a matter for the National Coal Board. However, the board advises that it is its policy not to supply fuel to striking mineworkers during any prolonged dispute, although exception might be made on compelling compassionate grounds.

Power Supplies

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Energy what arrangements he is making to deal with any emergency affecting power supplies arising from the current coal mining dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I do not presently envisage any emergency affecting power supplies arising from the current dispute in the coal industry.

Coal Imports

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the total tonnage of imported coal for the years 1979, 1982, and the latest available year; what were the countries of origin and tonnage from each country; and if he will give the cost per ton.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested on coal imports for the years 1979, 1982 and 1983 is published in table 75 of the "Digest of United Kingdom Energy Statistics 1984", a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Coal Production

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy how much coal has been produced in National Coal Board pits since the National Union of Mineworkers' dispute began.

Mr. David Hunt: I understand from the NCB that since the beginning of the NUM overtime ban, deep-mined production from NCB collieries has been 40,987,000 tonnes to the end of August 1984.

SOCIAL SERVICES

NHS (Privatisation)

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proposals he has received from Liverpool area health authority about the privatisation of parts of the National Health Service in Liverpool.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke None. I expect to receive proposals from Liverpool district health authority by 31 December 1984.

Benefits (Cash Advances)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what instructions have been issued by his Department to managers of local offices regarding receipts being produced by persons in receipt of benefits who have obtained cash advances for the purchase of household goods and electrical and gas appliances; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Instructions to local office staff on this matter are in paragraphs 7061-7064 of the S manual, a copy of which is in the Library. Girocheques for items of furniture and gas and electrical appliances should normally be made out to the supplier. Where payment is made to the claimant a receipt is requested when there is doubt that the money will be spent properly.

NHS (Liverpool)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultations have taken place between the Liverpool area health authority and health service trade unions concerning privatisation in the National Health Service in Liverpool; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Consultations are a matter for the health authorities concerned.

Deaf -blind People (Mobility Allowance)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations his Department has received from the Deaf-Blind Helpers' League concerning the award of mobility allowance to deaf-blind people; what response has been made; if there is any action he is taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I met representatives of the Deaf-Blind Helpers' League on 12 March and I am writing to them in response to subsequent representations. The issues involved in deciding claims for mobility allowance from the deaf-blind are often complex and we are currently awaiting a decision on a relevant appeal which has been made to the House of Lords.

General Practitioners

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what safeguards, other than professional, exist to monitor the service provided by general practitioners; and if he will make a statement about the avenues of complaint open to the public with regard to these services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Family practioner committees are responsible for administering arrangements for family practitioner services including those provided by general medical practitioners. The committees have a duty to ensure the adequacy of doctors' premises, to approve when and where certain services are to be provided and to monitor the standrards and use of deputising services in general medical practice. They also investigate complaints involving practitioners informally under certain circumstances, and formally under the National Health Service (Service Committees and Tribunals) Regulations 1974 (as amended).

We have recently issued a leaflet entitled "Complaints about Dentists, Chemists, Opticians and Family Doctors" (June 1984) which is freely available to the public and explains the procedures for complaining about family practitioner services.

Advice and assistance may also be obtained, in pursuance of complaints from the family practitioner committees and from community health councils and citizens advice bureaux.

Drugs (GP Prescribing)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the overall quantity of drugs in general and benzodiazepine in particular, prescribed by general practitioners in the past 12 months; and how these figures compare with the previous 12 months.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Private Nursing Homes

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what public or professional bodies exist to regulate the establishment of private nursing homes; and if he will make a statement on the safeguards which exist to ensure an adequate standard of service is provided by these homes.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: District health authorities are responsible for the registration of private nursing homes within their boundaries, and for ensuring that adequate standards are maintained. Health authorities are required to enter and inspect registered homes at least twice a year to ensure compliance with the provisions of the Nursing Homes Act 1975, as amended, and associated regulations. We are introducing further amendments to the legislation, from 1 January 1985, which will give health authorities additional powers to seek out unregistered premises offering nursing care, and to take action quickly in cases where registered homes are failing to meet the standards required.

Leeds Eastern District Health Authority

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to appoint a new chairman for Leeds eastern district health authority.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Regional and District Health Authorities (Chairmen)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many regional and district health authority chairmanships are currently vacant; and how long the vacancies have existed.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Health Services for Children

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress has been made in the departmental study of health services for children announced in Cmnd. 9298, page 32; by whom the study is being conducted; and when a final report is expected.

Mr. John Patten: A small multidisciplinary team of officials is making a series of visits to different district health authorities in England to collect information for the Department about the administration of community child health services. The visits are expected to be completed by mid-1985. As indicated in Cmnd. 9298, the need for further action will be considered in the light of the information gathered.

Asthmatics (Prescribed Drugs)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide home nebulisers for asthmatics on prescription.

Mr. John Patten: For effective use, a nebuliser needs a special driving device such as an oil-free air compressor pump or special flow-head fitted to a cylinder of compressed air. If it is medically essential for a particular patient, including one suffering from asthma, to practise nebulisation at home, nebulisers and their driving mechanism may be provided on the NHS through the hospital service. We cannot justify the considerable additional cost of supplying this equipment on GPs' prescription.

GPs may prescribe a range of hand-held metered-dose aerosols with spacing devices which are effective alternatives to nebulising equipment for some patients.

Claimants (Available Scale Margin)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list each specific different group of claimants which will have an extra 50p deducted under the available scale margin rule after 26 November, and the amounts that will be saved in each case.

Mr. Whitney: About 400,000 people on the long-term rate of supplementary benefit currently receive additions to their benefit for special needs which are paid after deduction of the 50p available scale margin. These people will be up to 50p a week less well off than they would otherwise have been after the general uprating of benefits at the end of this month when the deduction will be increased to £1. They are in the following groups:

	Number affected (thousands)	Estimated savings 1984/85	(£ thousands) Full year
Supplementary pensioners	345	About 3,100	About 9,000
Sick and disabled*	30	About 300	About 800
Single parent families*	15	About 150	About 400
Unemployed men aged 60-64*	5	About 50	About 150
Others*	5	About 50	About 150

* Receiving supplementary allowance.

However, about 170,000 pensioners will be better off because of the forthcoming extensions to heating additions. Overall, the changes announced by my right hon. Friend on 18 June, at columns 20-22, will increase expenditure on social security benefits by some £1,600 million.

Benefit Claimants (Jury Service)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will seek to ensure unemployment and supplementary benefit claimants receive payment of housing benefit and unemployment benefit or supplementary benefit for Saturdays and Sundays whilst on jury service.

Mr. Newton: A claimant is not entitled to unemployment benefit during jury service, but he can claim compensation from the court for days of unemployment benefit lost, including any Saturday which falls within that period. As unemployment benefit is not payable for Sundays, no compensation can be claimed for that day. Supplementary benefit is not affected by periods of jury service and full weekly benefit continues to be paid in the normal way. Housing benefit is a means-tested weekly benefit and eligibility is not affected by a period of jury service.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many persons, male and female, were admitted to hospital in the United Kingdom for treatment for the side effects of drugs in the benzodiazepine group in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983;

(2) what was the nature of the side effects for which people were admitted to hospital in the United Kingdom resulting from the taking of prescribed drugs in the benzodiazepine groups in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether his Department will publish the results of research sponsored by it into the side effects of taking drugs in the benzodiazepine group;

(4) what research has been sponsored by his Department into the side effects of prescribed drugs in the benzodiazepine group in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Drug Addiction

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people, male and female, were admitted to hospital in the United Kingdom for treatment for addiction to prescribed drugs in the benzodiazepine group in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not have separate figures for admissions for dependence on drugs in this particular group.

Drugs (Repeat Prescriptions)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether any steps have been taken to monitor repeat prescriptions for drugs in the benzodiazepine groups in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983; and with what results;

(2) what guidance has been issued to the medical profession on the monitoring of repeat prescriptions of drugs in the benzodiazepine group in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983; and if he has any plans to issue further guidance.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We cannot identify repeat prescriptions of drugs from any data we hold centrally. Records of prescribing for individual patients, including any continuing medication, are held only by their general practitioners.

The British National Formulary, which is distributed free of charge by our Department to all NHS prescribing doctors, stresses that sedatives and tranquillisers, of which Benzodiazepines are the most commonly used, should not be prescribed routinely but reserved for short courses to alleviate acute conditions.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many of the prescriptions written for drugs in the benzodiazepine group in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983 were repeat prescriptions;

(2) what was the total cost to the National Health Service of prescriptions written in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983 for drugs in the benzodiazepine group;

(3) what was the total number of prescriptions written in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983 for drugs in the benzodiazepine group.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The number and cost of prescriptions written by general practitioners and dispensed by chemists and appliance contractors in England for drugs in the benzodiazepines group was as follows. All figures are estimates based on a one in 200 sample of dispensed prescriptions.

	Number of prescriptions million	Basic ingredient cost £ million
1981	24·2	31·9
1982	24·4	35·3
1983*	17·7	27·1

* January to September.

Information is not yet available for the 4th quarter of 1983.

No information is available about the numbers of repeat prescriptions.

Distinction Awards

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what criteria the newly awarded distinction awards to medical practitioners are made.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Distinction awards are made only to consultants and community physicians in the NHS.

The criteria used by the advisory committee on distinction awards in recommending my right hon. Friend to grant distinction awards were set out by the immediate past chairman, Sir Stanley Clayton, MD MS FRCP FRCS FRCOG, in an article published in "Health Trends" (November 1979). They include direct service to patients or their general practitioners, improvement of the service training and teaching research, medical administration, and clinical or academic distinction. Hard work and outstanding service to the NHS may alone be sufficient reason for an award, particularly at the B and C levels.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what criteria increases in the grading of existing distinction awards in teaching district health authorities are made.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The criteria used by the advisory committee on distinction awards in recommending awards for consultants and community physicians in teaching district health authorities are the same as those used for practitioners from non-teaching authorities.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to fund all distinction awards to medical practitioners centrally.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. Health authorities meet the costs of distinction awards.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy to publish the names of members of the advisory committee on distinction awards, including central awards committee, each regional higher awards committee, and regional C awards committee in the medical press each year.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is open to the medical press to publish the names of the members of the central advisory committee on distinction awards at any time. Membership lists of all other committees are readily available to interested practitioners through their local medical advisory machinery or on request to the secretariat.

Benefits (Borders Area)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of families being supported by (a) supplementary benefit, (b) unemployment benefit, (c) family income supplement and (d) single parent benefit in the Borders area of his Department for each year since 1979.

Mr. Whitney: The Borders area is covered for supplementary benefit purposes by one DHSS office and for unemployment benefit purposes by two unemployment benefit offices.

The total number of (a) supplementary benefit cases and (b) unemployment benefit cases handled at May of each of the years requested was:

(a) Supplementary benefit

	Number
1979	3,951
1980	3,845
1981	4,514
1982	5,257
1983	5,778
1984	5,947

(b) Unemployment benefit

	Number
1979	522
1980	619
1981	*
1982	1,061
1983	1,185
1984	*

* Not available.

Information on the number of families paid these benefits is not available. Figures of those paid unemployment benefit in 1981 and 1984 are not available due to industrial action.

Information is not available about family income supplement and single parent benefits in individual local office areas.

Nurses

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) qualified and (b) unqualified nurses are employed by the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The requested information is as follows:

Nursing and midwifery staff England—30 September 1983*

	Number
Qualified	223,500 (WTE)‡
Unqualified†	171,200 (WTE)‡

* Excludes agency staff.

† Includes nurse learners and qualified nurses undertaking training for a further qualification.

‡ Whole-time equivalent.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) state-registered nurses and (b) state-enrolled nurses are currently unemployed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We are not in a position to collect this information. There are always vacant nursing posts in less popular specialties in certain parts of the country.

Working Paper C

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish working paper C, commissioned by his Department from the Policy Studies Institute and presented to his Department in July.

Mr. Newton: Working paper C is one of a number of papers produced by the Policy Studies Institute, which we commissioned to research into the effects of the 1980 changes to the supplementary benefit scheme. It was given to the Department, in draft, later than the other papers, and we have a number of comments on the draft which are still being considered by the institute.

Clinicians (Award Holders)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy to publish annually in the medical press the names of clinicians who are award holders.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. If the names of award holders were publicly disclosed, patients and others might make misleading judgments on the standing of the recipients without appreciating all the factors involved in the granting of awards. The names of award holders are, however, available to practitioners generally within their region on request to the regional medical officer.

Drugs (Self-help Groups)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what grants were made to self-help groups by his Department in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983 to deal with withdrawal problems for those who had been prescribed drugs in the benzodiazepine group in the years 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The only grant made to a voluntary organisation providing services specifically for problem benziodiazepine users in the years mentioned by the hon. Member was one of £10,183 to Tranx, Harrow for 1983-84.

However, a number of voluntary organisations have received grants for services to problem drug-takers during this period and some of these include benzodiazepine users among their clientele. Grants to all voluntary organisations in the drugs field totalled £285,690 in 1980-81, £347,360, in 1981-82, £433,174 in 1982-83 and £1,040,091 in 1983-84.

Resettlement Units

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the future of Department of Health and Social Security resettlement units.

Mr. Newton: The future of resettlement units is still under consideration.

Miners (National Insurance Contributions)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if striking miners, claiming supplementary benefit for their families, will be credited for national insurance contributions.

Mr. Newton: A person who is disqualified for receiving unemployment benefit because of the trade dispute provisions is not entitled to credits for national insurance contributions, irrespective of whether he receives supplementary benefit for his family.

Newcastle Offices (Carpeting)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost of the carpets laid recently in his Department's offices in Newcastle.

Mr. Newton: The Department's central offices in Newcastle employ 10,500 staff and require over 1·3 million sq. ft. of carpeting. In the financial year 1984-85 to date some 92,000 sq. ft. of carpeting have been laid to replace worn and damaged carpeting, at a cost of £80,880.

Newcastle Offices (Taxi Service)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much extra the taxi service for out-of-hours staff at his Department's Newcastle offices will cost as a result of the proposed changes in staff rotas.

Mr. Newton: Additional costs of taxi service up to an estimated maximum of £10,000 a year could arise, but only if the night shifts were timed to start when public transport to the office was no longer available. The shift times remain open to local negotiation.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Expenditure

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about expenditure on education and science in 1985-86.

Sir Keith Joseph: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his statement today, provision for education and science will be increased by £210 million to £13,590 million from the figures in Cmnd. 9143 after allowing for the abolition of the national insurance surcharge from April 1985. Three-quarters of the programme is local authority current expenditure which, after allowing for the transfer of funds to the Manpower Services Commission, is increased by nearly £300 million. There is a net reduction of £24 million in vote expenditure.

2. The level of services that can be afforded within the cash plans will again depend on the ability of local authorities and others to contain their costs, including those of pay settlements. The policies outlined as follows are compatible with the Government's assumption of pay increases of 3 per cent. in 1985-86 for those groups for which the Government are responsible.

LOCAL AUTHORITY EXPENDITURE ON EDUCATION, SCHOOL MEALS AND MILK

3. Within total relevant planned current expenditure in England in 1985-86 of over £21,000 million, it is for local authorities to decide the balance between services, taking into account their statutory obligations and Government policies. The total allocated to education in the Government's plans is £10,259 million. This represents an increase of about 6 per cent. in cash over the sum allocated to the service in 1984-85 after allowing for the abolition of the National Insurance Surcharge and the transfer of some funding to the Manpower Services Commission. In addition, as in the last two years, part of total current expenditure will be treated as an amount not allocated between services. This is in recognition of the fact that some local authorities will spend more than the Government consider to be desirable on services including education and need more time to bring spending into line with Government plans. The size of the sum in 1985-86 will be £600 million.

4. Within the planned total for expenditure on education, the level of spending by individual local education authorities will depend upon their local decisions and upon their success in containing costs. If local authorities with education responsibilities spend at their provisional 1985-86 targets, their expenditure would in aggregate increase by about 2·7 per cent. compared with 1984-85 budgets at a time when school rolls are continuing to fall.

5. The figure of £10,259 million includes £280 million for school meals and milk. A number of local education authorities have been able to make substantial reductions in net expenditure under this head. I look to authorities to review the provision that they make for school meals in order to secure savings in line with the Government's plans thereby releasing resources to support policies more directed to the educational benefit of pupils and students.

Schools

6. Overall, school rolls will continue to fall and the plans assume that authorities will secure a further reduction in the number of school teachers they employ. Provided the cost of employing staff can be contained, there should be scope for a continuing modest improvement in pupil-teacher ratios, compared with January 1984. This would give authorities the opportunity to make some progress with the implementation of policies for schools outlined in my speech at Sheffield earlier this year. The situation will vary between authorities, depending on factors such as their expenditure targets and their ability to redeploy teachers quickly in response to falling rolls. I look forward to discussions with the local education authorities about the paper "Schoolteacher Numbers and Deployment in the Longer Term", which the Department made available last September.

7. Authorities are continuing to make significant savings through taking surplus places out of use and remain on course to take over 1 million places out of use by March 1987. I have agreed with the local authority associations that new targets should be adopted for taking further surplus places out of use by 1987 and for future years and I shall be discussing with them what these should be.

8. The latest firm information on expenditure on books shows a significant increase in the level of provision per pupil between 1981-82 and 1982-83. If costs can be contained and savings made elsewhere — for example, in caretaking and cleaning cost — there should be scope for some further improvement in expenditure per pupil compared to 1982-83 levels in many authorities both in the provision of books and equipment and expenditure on repairs and maintenance.

Non-Advanced Further Education

9. The overall level of resources proposed should enable authorities to respond to the growing and varied demand for NAFE. There are inevitable uncertainties about student numbers. The plans assume some limited increase in the participation rate of 16 and 17 year olds in future years.

10. The student: staff ratio slackened by about 2 per cent. between 1982-83 and 1983-84. The expenditure plans as they relate to NAFE imply some limited tightening of the SSR between 1983-84 and 1985-86. It should be possible in aggregate for the 1982-83 level of provision per student on books and equipment to be maintained in the great majority of local authorities if other non-teaching costs can be restrained.

11. The plans for net expenditure on NAFE assume the transfer of £61·75 million to the Manpower Services Commission following the White Paper 'Training for Jobs' (Cmnd. 9135) to enable it to purchase a more significant proportion of work-related non-advanced further education.

In-Service Training

12. Both the Government and the local authorities attach importance to in-service training as a means of further developing the skills of teachers in schools and in further education in response to changing demands and priorities. I have agreed with leaders of the local authority associations that the scheme of in-service training grants first introduced last year should be further enlarged in 1985-86. Grant of £17·5 million will be available in the 1985-86 financial year, and three new priority areas will be included in the scope of the scheme. These will apply to a special programme to support the introduction of general certificate of secondary education; the teaching of craft, design and technology in schools; staff development associated with professional, industrial and commercial updating (PICKUP) programmes in further education, and the updating of staff on work-related courses.

Education Support Grants (ESGs)

13. The Education (Grants and Awards) Act 1984 comes into operation for the first time in 1985-86. The Government intend to support some £30 million of expenditure on activities in support of national priorities through £21 million of grant. The choice of activities to be supported follows detailed consultation with the local authority associations and the breadth of support is reflected in the fact that all but one authority have bid for support in 1985-86 and that each of the eleven activities for which bids were invited was oversubscribed. Decisions on the allocations to authorities of expenditure to be supported under the Act will be announced next month.

Capital Expenditure

14. Provision for local authority capital expenditure on education will be £272 million. This represents a reduction on plans of £18 million. The reduced provision should permit continuing progress with the removal of surplus school places and with selective re-equipment in further education. The Department will be writing as soon as possible to local education authorities to inform them of the allocations within the education block.

Higher Education

15. The cash available for each sector is set out below. The figures allow for a tuition fee of £520 for home full-time and sandwich course students on courses designated for mandatory student awards. The UGC and NAB plans for student admissions in 1985-86, together with admissions to direct grant institutions, are likely to satisfy the revised lower level of demand for higher education, as indicated by the projection in the "Report on Education No. 100".

Student Awards

16. There will be a net reduction in the previously planned level of spending on student awards in 1985 and the parental contribution scale will be adjusted upwards in line with earnings in the past year; this means that some 10,000 families who would otherwise have been drawn into contributing will be relieved of the need to do so. However, minimum maintenance awards will no longer be made to those whose parents would otherwise be liable to meet the full cost of maintenance and contributions from those in the middle and upper reaches of the income scale will be increased. In addition the income scale will be extended, for those most able to pay, to include a contribution up to the maximum of the designated tuition fee. Details of the new rates of award and revised contribution scales will be announced later.

Universities

17. Subject to parliamentary approval, the total of recurrent grant for universities in the UGC list for 1985-86 academic year will be £1,309 million. This total has been set at a level consistent with previously planned economies and with the Government's 3 per cent. assumption for pay. To the extent that the academic year falls partly in the 1986-87 financial year the grant is subject to review in the normal way.

18. The revised grant for the 1984-85 academic year will be £1,262 million. This takes account of the revised pay assumption for the period 1 April to 31 July 1985.

19. Equipment grant for the academic year 1985-86 will be £90·4 million, a cash increase of 3 per cent. compared with 1984-85. In addition, I intend, subject to further discussion with the UGC, to make available £10 million in each of financial years 1985-86 and 1986-87 to enable them to operate a scheme for the improvement of laboratory and equipment provision in a few carefully selected centres of research.

Advanced Further Education

20. Followng consultation with the local authority associations, I have determined under regulations made under the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980 the quantum of advanced further education (AFE) expenditure within the predetermined pool in 1985-86 at £620 million. After allowing for the abolition of the national insurance surcharge, this represents an increase of over 7·5 per cent. compared to the size of the quantum for 1984-85. The revised total provides for a further overall increase in student numbers and a shift in the balance of students towards science and engineering in 1985-86. Compared to existing provision the total implies continuing reductions in unit costs and in lecturer numbers, leading to a student : staff ratio averaging 12 : 1 in the 1985-86 academic year. The National Advisory Body is at present considering the method of distributing the quantum for 1985-86 between authorities including the possibility that a limited sum from within the quantum might be used to support some modest new initiatives. I will decide on each authority's share of the quantum later in the year in the light of the NAB's advice.

21. Following consultations with the Voluntary Sector Consultative Council I have determined the quantum of AFE expenditure at voluntary colleges grant-aided solely by my Department at £41 million. I will decide its distribution between the colleges later this year in the light of NAB's advice.

The Science Budget

22. The Science Budget for 1985-86, from which the research councils receive their grants in aid, will be £587 million, an increase in cash of £14 million over previous published plans for that year. Of this, I am setting aside £6 million to be used, in the light of advice from the ABRC, to assist research councils to make progress with the plans for major restructuring on which they have embarked. These plans will as they are implemented release substantial resources for redeployment to areas of high scientific promise. The remaining £8 million of the £14 million increase will be distributed following advice from the ABRC. My hope is that this will enable Councils to fund more university research projects of the highest quality.

Teachers

Mr. Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers have been struck off the list of qualified teachers by his Department in the current year; how this compares to previous years; for what offences teachers have been struck off; and what measures are taken to identify and remove such teachers.

Mr. Dunn: During the financial year 1983-84, 36 persons were totally excluded and 3 partially excluded from employment as teachers on the grounds of their misconduct. The comparable figures for the two previous years are as follows:

Year	Total Exclusions	Partial Exclusions
1981-82	40	5

The majority of such exclusions followed sexual, financial and drug offences. The individuals are identified from reports made by their employers and by the police. To make exclusion effective the Department gives details in confidence to local education authorities and all other bodies concerned with the employment of teachers.

Mathematics Teachers

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of teachers of mathematics in maintained middle schools had no recorded qualification in that subject at the latest available date; and what steps he is taking to reduce this percentage.

Mr. Dunn: In middle schools, mathematics is taught partly by specialist and partly by class teachers. In a survey of 48 maintained middle schools for pupils aged 9-13 undertaken in 1979-80 HM inspectors found 579 teachers teaching mathematics, of whom 110 (19 per cent.) had studied mathematics as part of a first degree or as a main subject in their teaching certificate. Of the 35 teachers who taught mathematics for more than half of their week, 21 (60 per cent.) were so qualified.

I have described the measures which the Government are taking to improve initial training in mathematics and the supply of specialist teachers of the subject in the answers I am giving today to my hon. Friend's other questions. These measures will be relevant to raising the level of qualification of those teaching mathematics in middle schools.

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what efforts he is making to attract more mathematics graduates into teaching, following the recommendation of the Cockcroft report.

Mr. Dunn: The Government have maintained the number of initial teacher training places in mathematics within a total provision of training places for intending secondary teachers which has been reduced because of falling secondary school rolls. Recruitment to post-graduate courses in mathematics has been good for the last four years and we expect the supply of newly-trained mathematics teachers to be adequate in relation to the number of vacancies for them. The Department's recruitment literature stresses the good opportunities for mathematics graduates within the teaching profession.

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to review and evaluate the courses provided for the initial training of future mathematics teachers following the remarks in the Cockcroft report on the variety of practice that existed at the time of publication of that report.

Mr. Dunn: All initial teacher training courses, including those for intending mathematics teachers, will be reviewed over the next three to four years by the new Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education. Courses will be assessed against a set of rigorous criteria, which include requirements relating to the academic and professional content of courses and specify a minimum amount of time to be devoted to the study of teaching mathematics in primary training.

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of teachers of mathematics in maintained secondary schools had no recorded qualification in that subject at the latest available date; and what steps he is taking to reduce this percentage.

Mr. Dunn: The latest information currently available relates to November 1977, when it is estimated that 29 per cent. of teachers then teaching mathematics in maintained secondary schools in England and Wales did not have a recorded qualification in mathematics (no information was collected about qualifications at or below A level). A new survey of secondary school staffing was carried out in January this year and results will be available shortly.

My right hon. Friend wishes to see a reduction in the amount of teaching carried out by teachers whose qualifications are not well matched to their task. The steps which the Government are taking to achieve this were set out in the White Paper "Teaching Quality" published last year. In particular, the Department pays grant to local education authorities to release for further training teachers of mathematics in secondary schools who are inadequately qualified in the subject.

Overseas Students

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he intends to set a maximum fee for overseas students; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend sets maximum fees only for overseas students who began their courses before 1 September 1980, who are excluded from the effects of the Government's policy that overseas students should pay fees that cover the cost of their education. For other overseas students, institutions and local education authorities are free to determine the fee to be charged in accordance with the Government's policy and in the light of their own circumstances.

Glue Sniffing

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to control glue sniffing among schoolchildren.

Mr. Dunn: As part of the Government's policy for tackling solvent misuse among young people, the Department issued in June a safety in education bulletin which included advice about solvent misuse. Copies of the bulletin have been sent to local education authorities for distribution to schools and colleges.

Inspectors' Reports

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will detail the current procedures for reviewing reports of independent schools' inspectors; and if he has any plans to alter them.

Sir Keith Joseph: Her Majesty's Inspectorate reports the findings of its formal inspections to me. Since January 1983 I have published all these reports, as written by Her Majesty's Inspectorate. The reports are issued to the local education authorities, schools and colleges concerned a fortnight before being made more widely available. Those responsible are asked to inform the Department within three months of the actions they consider necessary in the light of Her Majesty's Inspectorate's report, what they plan to do, and what implications the report may have for other schools or colleges in the area. I intend to continue these arrangements, unchanged.

Scottish Universities (Age Participation Rates)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information his Department has from the 1981 census on age-participation rates at universities in Scotland by social class.

Mr. Brooke: None. The 1981 census identified full-time students but not by the type of institution they attended.

University Students (Statistics)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information his Department now has from the 1981 census on the percentage of young people at university by social class of father; and how these percentages compare with corresponding figures for 1971.

Mr. Brooke: None. The 1981 census identified students in full-time education, but not the type of institution attended.

However, information about the social classes of the parents of students accepted for universities through the Universities' Central Council of Admissions (UCCA) in 1983 was published in table E8 of the statistical supplement to its 21st report, a copy of which will be placed in the Library. Similar information has been published by UCCA since 1980.

University Grants Committee (Computers)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many computers are available to the University Grants Committee.

Mr. Brooke: The University Grants Committee has a small microcomputer and has access to a computer bureau, and to the Department of Education and Science computer at Darlington.

Independent Schools

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied with his powers under section 71 of the Education Act 1944 in respect of the conduct of independent schools.

Mr. Dunn: Yes.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list in the Official Report those independent schools on which a notice of complaint has been served under section 71 of the Education Act 1944 in each of the last 10 years and those schools which have consequently been deleted from the independent schools register.

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the proposals outlined in the Queen's Speech concerning the rights of parents to exempt their children from corporal punishment will extend to those parents whose children are educated under the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Dunn: Yes.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the proposals outlined in the Queen's Speech concerning the rights of parents to exempt their children from corporal punishment will extend to those children whose school fees are paid, in sum or in part, by the Ministry of Defence.

Mr. Dunn: No.

Boarding School Allowance Scheme

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to in how many schools currently educating children of Her Majesty's forces personnel under the boarding school allowance scheme those children constitute, (a) less than 10 per cent., (b) more than 10 per cent., (c) more than 20 per cent., (d) more than 30 per cent., (e) more than 40 per cent., (f) more than 50 per cent. and (g) more than 75 per cent. of its pupils.

Mr. Dunn: The Department does not collect this information.

Secondary Schools (Closures)

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy regarding amending proposals put forward by local authorities to close or amalgamate secondary schools pursuant to the Education Act 1980, before those proposals are adopted by the local authority concerned.

Mr. Dunn: It is for local education authorities, in consultation with the governors of voluntary aided and special agreement schools, to take a view on the form and pattern of secondary education best suited to local circumstances and the preferences of parents and, when necessary, to publish proposals as required by the Education Act 1980. Where such proposals fall to my right hon. Friend to decide, he may approve or reject them or may approve them with such modifications which, after consultation with the local education authority concerned, he thinks desirable. However his powers of modification are limited since he cannot so change proposals as to make it impossible to regard what is there as still being the original in modified form.

Within these limits, my right hon. Friend's policy is to exercise this power where he has certain reservations but is otherwise minded to give his approval, to bring proposals more into line with his policies, particularly those set out in circulars 2/80, 2/81 and 4/82. Once proposals have been determined by the local authority or approved by my right hon. Friend, he may also, at the request of the authority, modify any proposals which they are required to implement by virtue of the Act.

Cash Limits

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he intends to revise any of the cash limits within his programme in 1984-85.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend proposes to reduce the cash limit on the Central Administration vote by £422,000 from £49,991,000 to £49,569,000. This reduction results from a misallocation of provision transferred from the Property Services Agency in respect of accommodation charges. This announcement reflects one being made by my right hon. Friend the Attorney-General, which, subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, will make the corresponding increase to the cash limit on the Treasury Solicitor's vote, class IX vote 9.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Supreme Court (Official Referees)

69. Mr. Spearing asked the Attorney-General if he is satisfied with the rate of disposal of cases by the official referees of the Supreme Court.

The Attorney-General: Her Majesty has recently appointed two new circuit judges to dispose of official referees' business, thereby bringing the total number of official referees in London to six. These additional appointments should increase the rate of disposal and reduce the backlog of cases. The position will be kept under review.

County Courts

70. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Attorney-General whether Her Majesty's Government have any proposals for increasing the staffing level in county courts in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Staffing levels are maintained as necessary to ensure a satisfactory level of service having regard to the predicted volume of work in particular courts. Within the overall ceiling of the Department additional manpower is allocated to deal with increases in the volume of business.

Defamation

Mr. Waller asked the Attorney-General if he will seek to make legal aid available in respect of cases of defamation.

The Attorney-General: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend on 19 March 1984 at column 698-99.

Duties

Mr. Baldry asked the Attorney-General what are the duties by statute and convention of the Attorney-General.

The Attorney-General: My duties, whether deriving from statute, from common law or simply from convention, are too numerous, and in some cases would require too detailed an exposition, to be described both comprehensively and accurately in a parliamentary answer. But the following is a summary list of the more important.

I am the Government's principal legal adviser and, as such, give legal advice to the Cabinet and Cabinet Committees collectively and to my Ministerial colleagues individually (or to the officials of their Departments). This advice may have to concern any aspect of Government business and may involve any branch of the law, whether civil or criminal, public or private, domestic or international. I frequently advise on questions concerning proposed legislation and I have a special responsibility in respect of issues of legal policy (for example, retrospective effect, unusual powers or burden of proof) arising in connection with such legislation. I answer in the House of Commons for the Lord Chancellor and his Department as well as for myself and my own Department, for the Department of the Director of Public Prosecutions and for the Treasury Solicitor's Department, and I am responsible for the carriage through the House of Commons of legislation which is promoted by the Lord Chancellor.

I have a general responsibility for litigation to which the Crown (or, in international tribunals, Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom) is a party and I may be asked to advise on specific issues in relation to such litigation: I regularly supervise the conduct of the more important cases. I am myself the formal plaintiff or defendant in proceedings under the Crown Proceedings Act 1974 where there is no Government Department that is specifically authorised under the Act for that purpose. In my capacity as guardian of the public interest, I bring proceedings ex officio to secure the observance of legal obligations, especially by public bodies or by private persons alleged to be committing a public wrong, and I authorise such proceedings to be brought in my name at the relation of other persons. It is in this capacity also that I bring proceedings for contempt of court. It is also my responsibility to initiate proceedings to have somebody declared a vexatious litigant. I act for the Crown, in its capacity as parens patriae, in charity matters and have a variety of functions in that field which sometimes involve my being a party to litigation to determine the duties of charitable trustees or to protect the interests of the objects of charity.

I nominate counsel to act for the Crown in both civil and criminal proceedings. In criminal matters, I superintend the discharge of his functions by the Director of Public Prosecutions and I have certain specific functions of my own in relation to prosecution: for example, prosecutions for certain offences can be brought only by me or with my consent and I also have the power to enter a nolle prosequi. I also have certain functions in relation to the proceedings of coroners' courts.

The above account relates to my functions as Attorney-General for England and Wales. I have similar, but not in all respects identical, functions in my capacity as Attorney-General for Northern Ireland. In particular, the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland operates under my general superintendence.

In addition to these matters in which I function as the legal adviser to the Government or as the representative of the Crown, I also have certain responsibilities, by virtue of my office as Attorney-General, to the two Houses of Parliament. Thus, I have a limited responsibility for advising the House of Commons or any of its Committees on certain aspects of its business and in particular I am a member of the Committee of Privileges and give advice to that Committee. I also advise the House of Lords in peerage cases. In yet a different capacity, but still by virtue of my office as Attorney-General, I have certain duties and responsibilities as leader of the English Bar and as leader of the Northern Ireland Bar.

For a more comprehensive and discursive, though inevitably still incomplete, account of the functions of the Attorney-General, I refer my hon. Friend to the standard legal textbooks and in particular to Professor J. Ll. J. Edwards' seminal work, "The Law Officers of the Crown" (1964), which he has recently supplemented by a further book entitled "The Attorney General, Politics and the Public Interest" (1984).

Treasury Solicitor's Department

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Attorney-General whether any change has been made to the class IX, vote 9, cash limit for the Treasury Solicitor's Department.

The Attorney-General: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class IX, vote 9, will be increased by £1,295,000 from £12,062,000 to £13,357,000.

An additional £94,000 is required by the Department of the Director of Public Prosecutions for the establishment on 1 January 1985 of a fraud investigation group. Additional provision of £1,220,000 is required as a result of the misallocation of the provision transferred from the Property Services Agency for the property repayment services.

The increase will be partly offset by increased receipts of £19,000. In addition, £422,000 is being transferred from the Department of Education and Science to whom the Property Repayment Services provision was originally misallocated. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education is announcing today the consequent reduction to the cash limit on class X, vote 4. The remaining requirement of £873,000 will be charged to the Reserve and has been taken into account in the estimated outturn of the public expenditure planning total for 1984-85 given in the autumn statement on 12 November 1984.

PRIME MINISTER

Coal Industry (Dispute)

Mr. Nellist asked the Prime Minister if she will arrange for detailed information on the cost of the mining dispute to be collected and made available to Parliament in the manner of the information provided by the Secretary of State for Social Services in relation to the dispute at the computer centre in Tyne and Wear.

The Prime Minister: The final cost cannot be determined until the strike ends, but the scale of what would be involved for the PSBR if the strike continued until Christmas was given to the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 30 October at column 1184.

Lighthouse Board

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Prime Minister if she will seek to introduce public funding to defray the operating and maintenance costs of the lighthouse boards.

The Prime Minister: No.

Falkland Islands

Mr. David Young asked the Prime Minister what is the up-to-date cost of all Government operations in the Falklands since 2 April 1982 and the cost per capita in terms of the Falklands population.

The Prime Minister: Total extra Government expenditure in connection with the Falkland Islands from 2 April 1982 up to the end of the current financial year is forecast to amount to some £2,100 million, equivalent to just over £1 million per head of population. This includes the cost of recovering the islands following the Argentine invasion.

Nuclear Submarines (Log Books)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether she is satisfied with the security arrangements for the keeping of log books on nuclear submarines.

The Prime Minister: The circumstances attending the disappearance of Conqueror's control room log for the period April to September 1982 are being investigated by a Royal Navy board of inquiry. Any lessons arising from this inquiry will be incorporated into our security arrangements.

Local Government Expenditure (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Prime Minister what is the total of local government expenditure in London; and if she will break this down by authority in cash and percentage terms.

The Prime Minister: The information is as follows:

HMS Conqueror (Navigator's Log Book)

Mr. Gould asked the Prime Minister if the police have been instructed to make inquiries into the disappearance of the log book from HMS Conqueror.

The Prime Minister: No. This disappearance is being investigated by a Royal Navy board of inquiry.

ENVIRONMENT

Public Expenditure

Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will give details of his public expenditure programmes for 1985-86.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has announced the main changes to the Government's public expenditure plans for 1985-86 and later years. The following table gives details of the changes in my Department's programmes.

Resources for spending in the public sector next year will be very limited, and have been further stretched by the continuing over-spending by local authorities. As I announced on 24 July, we have had to increase local authority relevant current expenditure provision (adjusted for changes in the responsibilities of local authorities) by some £800 million. I have consulted local government on the various elements of the 1985-86 rate support grant settlement and will lay proposals before Parliament in December.

There was a substantial overspend on local authority net capital provision in 1983-84, and there is again likely to be an overspend in 1984-85. The figures in the table take account of both.

For housing we have made a small reduction of £65 million on the gross provision. Expenditure will be supported by a level of capital receipts £430 million higher than we assumed last year for 1985-86; this higher estimate has been made possible by the success and extension of our right-to-buy policies.

I shall be announcing later, in the usual way, the apportionment of this total between the local authorities and the Housing Corporation; and individual local authorities will be receiving their detailed housing investment programme allocations. I am considering whether any change should be made in the prescribed proportion of capital receipts which authorities may use to augment their allocations, bearing in mind that local authorities were told in Cmnd. 9143 that they could plan their programmes on the assumption that their allocations for 1985-86 would be not less than 80 per cent. of those in 1984-85.

Expenditure at these levels means that it is more important than ever to determine clear priorities for spending on housing and to seek the most cost effective solutions. It will be necessary for local authorities to concentrate more resources on the repair and renovation of their houses and flats and to make a start on dealing with the emerging problem of structural defects. Where authorities have blocks of flats or housing estates which need substantial renovation for which they do not have the resources in the near future, I will expect them to make strenuous efforts to find private sector partners who can take this on.

For private sector property, it was never the Government's intention that expenditure on Home Improvement Grants should continue indefinitely at the levels of the last 2 or 3 years. It is primarily the responsibility of owners to keep their own dwellings in repair and where necessary to finance improvements by borrowing on the security of their properties. Accordingly, I would like to see home improvement grants focussed increasingly on those who can least afford to pay for repairs and improvements. I will shortly be issuing a consultation paper on proposals for legislation to secure this objective and I hope that so far as practicable local authorities will be guided by the general sense of these proposals in budgeting for improvement and repairs grants in the next financial year.

The urban programme will be continued with total provision (including other Department's contributions) of over £300 million a year for 1985-86 and the following two years. Within this total, provision for partnership and programme authorities will be continued at about the present cash level next year. The traditional urban programme will be concentrated in fewer areas, but existing revenue grants will be continued for their present term of up to five years. Provision for urban development grant will continue at a level that will enable schemes already approved to proceed and new schemes to be brought forward. In the two later years resources will increasingly be concentrated on the areas of greatest need.

Provision for local authority local environmental services capital is unchanged from the White Paper. The reduction of £45 million is the net PES provision for New Town expenditure and reflects a corresponding increase in the forecast receipts from disposal of commercial and industrial assets. Gross New Town expenditure will be maintained at the previously planned level.

I have made some additional resources available to the Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission to reflect costs involved in their obligations under the Wildlife and Countryside Act, and a small addition to maintain the Heritage provision.

The external finance limit for water authorities in England and Wales for 1985-86 will be £203 million, including £14 million for land drainage grants administered by MAFF and £20 million allocated to the Welsh Water Authority. For the English water authorities, the Government intend that there should be a significant increase in the provision for water investment from this year's provision of £686 million, to £769 million in 1985-86. This will allow us to make faster progress on replacement, repair and maintenance of sewers and water mains, and on improving the quality of rivers, estuaries and coastal waters. To finance this investment consistently with the reduced external finance limit, the Government have decided to set the financial targets for the water authorities to achieve an average rate of return of 1·4 per cent. in 1985-86 compared with this year's average rate of return of about 1·0 per cent. This is the first step in a policy to raise the average rate of return over three years to 1·7 per cent. and then to 1·9 per cent.

As a result water charges will increase by rather more than the general rate of inflation. Discussions will now take place with individual authorities to give effect to these policies.

An extra £15 million has been allocated to the Property Services Agency in 1985-86 for major new works and maintenance of the civil estate.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Glue Sniffing

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken on matters within his responsibility to combat the problem of glue sniffing.

Mr. Mellor: We issued a circular to chief officers of police in June this year setting out the various options and facilities open to the police. We have also consulted representatives of manufacturers and retailers on proposals to create an offence of selling substances to under-16s, knowing or believing that they are likely to be inhaled to achieve intoxication. The responses indicated widespread support for such legislation. The Government are prepared to support the introduction of a suitable Bill in Parliament.

Cable Authority

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to establish the new Cable Authority.

Mr. Brittan: In August I announced the appointment of Mr. Richard Burton as chairman of the Cable Authority. I have now appointed Professor James Ring to be deputy chairman and as members Mr. Paul Johnson, Mrs. Elizabeth MacDonald-Brown and Mr. Peter Paine. Further appointments will be announced in due course, but I propose now to make an order bringing into force the relevant provisions of the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984 so that the authority, comprising the above members, can be formally constituted very shortly. It is intended that the authority will assume its full powers under the Act in a few weeks' time.

Charity Commission

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any changes to announce in the cash limit for the Charity Commission vote, class 13, vote 18.

Mr. Brittan: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit on the Charity Commission vote will be raised by £74,000 from £4,762,000 to £4,836,000. The increase provides principally for costs associated with the computer installation in the official custodians division.

The additional expenditure will be charged to the Reserve and has been taken into account in the estimated outturn of the public expenditure planning total for 1984-85 given in the autumn statement today.

Coal Industry (Dispute)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide details as to the occupations of all persons arrested in the past 12 weeks on picket line duty at National Coal Board pits.

Mr. Giles Shaw: During the 12 weeks from 14 August to 16 November 2,079 people were arrested in connection with the miners' dispute. The occupations of those arrested which became known to the police over the same period are as follows:

Occupation	No.
Miners	1,951
Retired Miners	3
Member of Parliament	1
Transport workers	9
Students	15
Medical workers	2
Non-manual workers	12
Manual workers	88
Servicemen	11
Housewives	12
Unemployed	69
Total	2,173

The figures do not exactly tally because during this period the police became aware of the occupations of some of those arrested earlier, and it is not possible to separate the information about these arrests from that given above.

Shop Hours

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he expects to publish the report of the committee of inquiry into shop hours;

(2) whether he has received the report of the committee of inquiry into shop hours.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has now received the report and intends to publish it as soon as possible.

Shop Act 1950

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many letters he has received from hon. Members supporting the reform of the Shops Act 1950

Mr. Mellor: Since the defeat on 4 February 1983 of the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), which would have repealed these restrictions, nine Members of Parliament have written to my right hon. and learned Friend supporting the reform of the Shops Act 1950.

Mr. Edward Hopson

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which Edward Hopson was released from Broadmoor; what advance warning was given to the police in Ealing; and what steps were taken to reduce the scope for him committing offences against children of the type for which he had originally been committed to Broadmoor.

Mr. Mellor: Mr. Hopson was conditionally discharged from Broadmoor hospital with the consent of the Home Secretary, under section 66(2) of the Mental Health Act 1959, in April 1982. Consent was given in the light of a recommendation for discharge from the responsible medical officer at Broadmoor and of reports from him and other staff there.

On discharge Mr. Hopson went to live in a hostel in Kensington. The Metropolitan police were notified so that they would be aware of his residence in their area. In March 1983 he moved to a council flat in Hanwell. The police would normally be informed of such a move; it is not clear from Home Office records that they were informed on this occasion, and we are checking on this.

Before being conditionally discharged, arrangements were made for Mr. Hopson to be supervised by a consultant psychiatrist from Broadmoor and by a probation officer, and for both of them to send regular reports to the Home Office, so that Mr. Hopson's progress in the community could be kept under review.

Mr. Mohammed Siddique

Mr. Terry Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why Mr. Mohammed Siddique, who is on remand at Winston Green prison, has not been allowed to grow a beard and was forcibly shaved during the week ended 2 November.

Mr. Mellor: Mr. Siddique has not been forcibly shaved. He has been advised that if he wishes to grow a beard he must apply to the governor to be allowed to do so; he has not done so.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he takes to ensure the reasonable health and comfort of those detained in custody between arrest and trial.

Mr. Mellor: Responsibility for the treatment of persons in police custody rests with the relevant chief officer of police. Home Office guidance to chief officers on the treatment of persons in police custody is contained in section 4 of the "Consolidated Circular to the Police on Crime and Kindred Matters", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

The prison service has the duty of caring for the physical and mental health and welfare of every inmate in its custody, whether convicted or unconvicted. In any establishment this duty is shared between the medical officer and the governor and the governor is required to bring to my right hon. and learned Friend's attention any matter of concern which needs his consideration.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he intends to make with regard to time limits on the period between arrest and trial.

Mr. Mellor: We intend to seek powers in the Prosecution of Offences Bill to apply time limits to the period between an offender's first appearance in court following arrest or summons and his trial. My right hon. and learned Friend will determine the precise way in which these powers should be exercised after considering the results of field trials, which will explore the feasibility of particular time limits and their practical implications.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many complaints his Department has received in the last six months concerning lengthy remands in custody.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. If the hon. Member has particular cases in mind and would write to me, I should be glad to look into the matter.

Passports (Northern Ireland)

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many United Kingdom passports are currently held by United Kingdom citizens residing in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that the information requested is not available.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Northern Africa

74. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further aid proposals he intends to take in northern Africa.

Mr. Raison: Following my initiative the European Community Development Council decided on 31 October to allot £35 million to help fight African drought. £14 million of this is for food aid. This will be available for the Sahel countries in northern Africa, in addition to direct aid from Britain and elsewhere.

Africa (Drought Assistance)

76. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives Her Majesty's Government are currently taking to assist drought affected Africa.

Mr. Raison: We have food aid on its way shortly to Ethiopia and Mozambique. We have now committed to Ethiopia most of the £5 million I announced recently for drought-stricken countries. We have taken the initiative in getting the Council of Ministers to endorse last week a new allocation by the European Community for the same purpose worth £35 million, of which over £20 million will be food aid. We have encouraged the world food programme and the wider UN system to reinforce their efforts to deal with the Ethiopian drought.

Developing Countries

79. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with his European Economic Community counterparts on increasing assistance to developing countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: At the Development Council on 6 November, I discussed the various initiatives taken by the Community to aid developing countries. In particular Development Ministers endorsed an addition of 32 million ecu (£19 million) to the 1984 Community aid budget for emergency assistance to those suffering famine in Africa. On 11 October the Community offered 7 billion ecu (£4,140 million) for the 6th European development fund, an increase of over 50 per cent. on EDF V.

Lomé Convention

80. Mr. Lester asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects negotiations for a successor to the Lomé convention to be concluded.

Mr. Raison: I expect negotiations to be concluded in time for the new convention to be signed in Lomé in early December.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's role in negotiations on the renewal of the Lomé convention.

Mr. Raison: Her Majesty's Government have pressed our partners in the European Community to accept further liberalisation of the trade arrangements in the Lomé convention; and urged the Commission to find ways to improve the quality of aid from the European development fund. Progress on both issues has been made.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement outlining the present state of negotiations on the third Lomé convention; and what assessment he makes of the prospects for the successful negotiation of a new convention.

Mr. Raison: The last set of negotiations between European Community and African, Caribbean and Pacific Ministers took place in Brussels from 9 to 13 October when agreement was reached on all but a limited number of points. I expect the negotiations to be concluded soon so that the new convention can be signed in Lomé in early December.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why Her Majesty's Government are proposing that the additional money to be provided by the entry to the European Economic Community of Spain and Portugal to the Lomé convention should be used to tackle the problem of the burden-sharing key for European Community member states.

Mr. Raison: Her Majesty's Government did not put forward this proposal. The Council agreed to it in order to meet the concerns of some member states that their contribution keys to the European development fund were above their shares of Community VAT.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consideration the Government are giving to the African, Caribbean and Pacific proposals for the third Lomé convention.

Mr. Raison: The Government and the Community have paid careful attention to African, Caribbean and Pacific state proposals, many of which have been accepted in the lengthy process of negotiating the new convention.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will make it their policy to insist that African, Caribbean and Pacific countries accept tighter control on the Stabex funds in the context of the negotiations for the third Lomé convention and that new concessions by the Community are conditional on further concessions from the African, Caribbean and Pacific states.

Mr. Raison: The arrangements for controlling Stabex transfers have now been agreed ad referendum between the Community and the African, Caribbean and Pacific states. I believe these new arrangements will lead to tighter control over the use of Stabex funds.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the nature and purpose of the Government's efforts in the context of a new Lomé convention to seek to ensure that African, Caribbean and Pacific countries recognise and encourage private economic operators.

Mr. Raison: The Government believe that private economic operators have an important role to play in the development of the economies of African, Caribbean and Pacific states. To that end we have been working for provisions to encourage European private investment, in particular to facilitate the negotiation of effective bilateral investment promotion and protection agreements.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what efforts the Government are making with regard to the incorporation of human rights issues into the third Lomé convention.

Mr. Raison: The Government have been seeking a reference to human rights in the next convention. The Community has proposed mention of standard international texts such as the Universal Declaration on Human Rights. The African, Caribbean and Pacific states have not yet formally responded.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government are seeking references to policy dialogue in the context of the negotiations regarding the proposed third Lomé convention.

Mr. Raison: The Government have strongly supported the Community's proposal for the concept of policy dialogue to be incorporated in the third Lomé convention.

I believe that the text which has now been agreed ad referendum with the African, Caribbean and Pacific states is satisfactory.

Sri Lanka

81. Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, in the light of the success of the Victoria dam project in Sri Lanka, he will ensure that the aid programme continues to include a number of large-scale projects.

Mr. Raison: I am glad my hon. Friend has noted the success of the Victoria dam project. The aid programme will continue to finance sound development projects of whatever size within the resources available to it.

Ethiopia

82. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is satisfied with the level of transport support he has been able to provide for the assistance of famine relief in Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: Yes, so far, but I expect further needs for spares and perhaps more vehicles to emerge, as well as for British equipment to enhance the handling capacity of the docks.

87. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the provision of emergency aid to Ethiopia.

89. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on overseas aid to Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: I refer my hon. Friends to the comments I made in the debate on Foreign Affairs on 9 November and to my earlier replies today.

88. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will state the amount of overseas aid given to Ethiopia for each of the last six years; and if he will specify the form of such aid.

Mr. Raison: Following are the details:

Figures for aid given directly to the Ethiopian Government

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he intends to allocate grain from United Kingdom sources to meet Ethiopia's food requirements for 1985.

Mr. Raison: We will certainly contribute from the 1985 bilateral food aid programme: and I expect the 1985 European Community food aid programme, which is much larger, to make a major contribution also.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Ethiopian authorities about their threat to move the Royal Air Force famine relief operation out of Addis Ababa.

Mr. Raison: No formal request from the Ethiopian authorities for such a move has been received.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made at the United Nations to ensure that the Government of Ethiopia do not hinder the airlift of food and medical aid to that country.

Mr. Raison: None. But my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has been in touch with Mr. Perez de Cuellar on the need for overall co-ordination of the relief effort, and the Secretary-General has now appointed Dr. Jansson for this purpose.

Falkland Islands

83. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the arrangements he has made with the Government of the Falkland Islands concerning purchase of land by Falkland Islanders.

Mr. Raison: Yes.

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what inquiries were made into damage in the road between the airport and Port Stanley in the Falklands; what was the result of those inquiries; what disciplinary action was taken against those involved; what action is now proposed to repair the damage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The state of the Port Stanley airport road has been regularly monitored by engineering advisers, and there has also been investigations by the Royal Engineers and the Property Services Agency. This has shown that the Falklands climate and the nature of the usage of the road have led to unusually rapid deterioration, but I am advised that it is unlikely that contractual liability for the damge could be shown. Immediate repair work is being undertaken by the Royal Engineers.

Caribbean (Ministerial Visit)

84. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the recent visit to the Caribbean by the Minister for Overseas Development.

Mr. Raison: I visited Barbados, Grenada, Jamaica and Belize between 14 and 24 October 1984, to see something of Britain's aid programme in operation; to discuss development matters with local Ministers and officials; and to review our programmes with the British high commissions and ODA's development division in Barbados. While in Jamaica I signed a loan agreement for £2·5 million, to be spent on British machinery and equipment.

India

85. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will increase aid from the United Kingdom to India.

Mr. Raison: We have no plans to do so but will maintain our aid to India at a substantial level.

North African States

86. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the priorities which determine the Government's aid to north African states.

Mr. Raison: In deciding its allocation of aid the Government gives priority to developmental criteria. They also take account of any relevant commercial and political factors. Aid levels to north African states have been set with these points in mind.

Aid Programme

91. Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes are proposed in the aid programme in the financial years 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Raison: For 1984-85 no changes in the aid programme are proposed. I shall shortly be making a statement regarding the position for 1985-86 following the announcement of the Government's expenditure plans.

United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will support the United States and other countries by withdrawing the United Kingdom contribution to the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation if that organisation is not satisfactorily reformed and reconstituted.

Mr. Raison: I am currently reviewing our policy towards UNESCO. Over the last year Her Majesty's Government have sought reforms but not the reconstitution of UNESCO.

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations he proposed before reaching a decision on the future of United Kingdom membership of UNESCO; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: I will take into consideration the views of hon. Members and of those Organisations and individuals who have written to me. It was agreed at the United Kingdom national commission for UNESCO on 5 November that it would make a further assessment of the desirability of Britain's continued membership in the light of the outcome of the next general conference in October 1985. I shall remain in close touch with those countries who share our concerns about the organisation.

Overseas Aid

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of gross national product is committed by the Government to overseas aid.

Mr. Raison: In 1983, 0·35 per cent. of gross national product was provided for official development assistance. This figure is very close to the average (0·36) for all countries comprising the development assistance committee (DAC) of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD).

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the trend in real terms of expenditure on overseas aid in each of the next three years.

Mr. Raison: I shall shortly be making a statement on plans for the aid programme in 1985-86. For levels of aid in the two subsequent financial years the hon. Member must await the publication of the White Paper on public expenditure in February 1985.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the present level of assistance given by Her Majesty's Government in overseas aid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The Government have a substantial overseas aid programme, and will continue to maintain one in the future.

Overseas Development Administration (Budget)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what impact will be made upon the budget of the Overseas Development Administration by any grant of funds or food aid by the European Community to Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: Britain's share of overseas aid expenditure financed from the European Community budget is attributed to the public expenditure allocation for financing the United Kingdom aid programme. The United Kingdom share of the European Community's additional food and other emergency aid for Ethiopia, which has recently been approved, is some £2 million. The rate at which this EC allocation will be spent is uncertain so it is not yet known how much of it will count against the United Kingdom aid budget this financial year.

Colonial Service (Pensions)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will estimate the cost of giving credit for years of war service to post-war entrants of the Colonial Service in computing their pensions.

Mr. Raison: A broad estimate is that the enhanced entitlements would cost about £3 million a year in 1983 values, assuming no retrospection. The once-for-all administration costs of implementing the concession would amount to some £200,000.

Bangladesh

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government have any plans to increase food aid to Bangladesh.

Mr. Raison: No. But we are continuing to monitor the situation closely.

Disaster Unit

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many trucks, Land Rovers and other vehicles were owned by the Overseas Development Administration for the use of its disaster unit on 3 May 1979.

Mr. Raison: 16 trucks, 41 Land Rovers and 2 Land Rover ambulances.

European Development Fund

Mr. John Hume asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why Her Majesty's Government have supported the proposal that seven billion European currency units should be the total financial package for the sixth European development fund; and why it has opposed the French proposal of 7·5 billion European currency units.

Mr. Raison: The Government believe that the agreed Community offer of 7 billion ecu is fair and generous.

Sudan

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has received any request for aid from the Government of Sudan due to the current drought; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The Sudan Government have appealed generally for drought relief aid. The Sudanese ambassador in London has asked specifically for help for refugees arriving in the country.

We are now shipping 11,750 tonnes of wheat flour which will be sold by the UN High Commission for Refugees to provide funds for its refugee programme there. We have also asked the high commissioner for a full report to allow us to consider the Sudan Government's latest request.

Much is being done by the voluntary agencies. I expect to approve within the next few days the allocation of £1 million over four years for a refugee agricultural development scheme in the eastern Sudan. We have just agreed to provide £100,000 to the Catholic Fund for Overseas Development for food transport and emergency feeding to support a Save the Children Fund nutrition team to help coordinate the feeding of new refugees and existing refugee camps; and to contribute to the cost of a logistics team from the same agency to help transport and distribute food in Kordofan and Darfur provinces. We shall continue to monitor the possible need for further help.

United Nations Environmental Programme

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what participation his Department will have, in the coming year, in the United Nations environment programme.

Mr. Raison: Co-ordination of British participation in the work of the United Nations environment programme is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office would expect to be represented on the British delegation to the governing council meeting in May and to participate in other UNEP activities throughout the year. In addition, through the aid programme, we support a wide range of projects and programmes designed to support the work of UNEP.

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Department's current involvement with the United Nations environment programme human settlements (habitat) project.

Mr. Raison: The United Kingdom is not a member of the United Nations centre for human settlements (habitat). The majority of the projects initiated by that organisation are funded by the United Nations development programme to which we make a considerable contribution. We are in touch with the United Nations centre for human settlements on the British contribution to the international year of shelter for the homeless, 1987.

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, when meeting his European Economic Community colleagues, he will encourage them now to lend, together with the United Kingdom, their full support to the desertification consultative group of the United Nations environment programme.

Mr. Raison: At the meeting of the Governing Council of the United Nations environment programme in May the United Kingdom, in close consultation with our Community partners, was instrumental in promoting a decision on desertification which, among other things, sought to strengthen the role of the consultative group on desertification control. The issue is now under discussion in the United Nations General Assembly.

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made with the United Nations environment programme desertification project following the Sahelian conferences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: Following the United Nations conference on desertification in 1977, a plan of action to combat desertification was established. Progress in implementing the plan was reviewed by the governing council of the United Nations environment programme in Nairobi in May this year. It was agreed that the plan needed more focus on the most affected countries and that priority should be given to areas offering the best chances for substantial rehabilitation. The governing council called upon affected countries to establish national programmes to combat desertification and urged donors to increase their aid to such countries. The subsequent meeting in Dakar in July, called by the President of Senegal, reaffirmed this. The matter is now under discussion in the Second Committee of the United Nations General Assembly.

Food Aid

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a table of third world countries that have received food aid from the United Kingdom from 1980 to 1984 and the amount received by each.

Mr. Raison: The information requested is given in the following table. Statistics to the development assistance committee of the OECD are reported in US$ and presentation in this form provides a consistent picture of value.

Acid Rain

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures are being taken by his Department to encourage the development of research projects based upon arid-resistant plant species; what measures are being taken to promote planting nurseries for such species; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: I will let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

SOCIAL SERVICES

National Insurance (Review)

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has yet completed his review of national insurance contributions for 1985-86

Mr. Fowler: I have completed the annual review of national insurance contributions under section 120 of the Social Security Act 1975 and I have today laid two draft orders which require the approval of both Houses: the Social Security (Contributions, Re-rating) (No. 2) Order 1984 providing for contribution rates and profits limits to take effect from 6 April 1985, and the Social Security (Treasury Supplement to Contributions) (No. 2) Order, which provides for a reduction in the Treasury Supplement from 11 per cent. to 9 per cent. I have also laid the Social Security (Contributions) Amendment (No. 2) Regulations 1984, which set out new earnings limits for employees' and employers' contributions. A report by the Government Actuary (Cmnd. 9386) which accompanies the orders and regulations explains their effect on the National Insurance Fund.

Employees and Employers

As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in his statement today I do not propose to raise the rate of contribution for either employees or employers. However, in line with the requirements of the Social Security Pensions Act 1975, the lower earnings limit for Class 1 contributions is to be increased to £35·50 a week, just below the new basic retirement pension rate, and the upper earnings limit is to be raised to £265 a week, which is about 7·4 times the new basic pension rate. These new earnings limits replace the existing ones of £34 and £250 a week respectively. The effects of these changes are as follows.

Not Contracted-out Employees

Neither the employee nor his employer will have to pay a contribution if his earnings are less than £35·50 a week. For people earning between £35·50 and £250 (the old upper limit) there will be no increase for either the employee or the employer. For those with earnings between £250 and £265 (the new upper limit) the maximum increase will be £1·35 a week for the employee and £1·57 for the employer.

Contracted-out Employees

Contributions payable by contracted-out employees and their employers will rise slightly. Where earnings are less than £250 the increase will be very small, reflecting the fact that the increase in the lower earnings limit reduces the band of earnings on which the lower contracted-out rate is paid; the increase on earnings between £35·50 and £250 will generally be 3p for the employee and 6p for the employer. Additional contributions will be payable on earnings between £250 and £265 (the new upper limit); the maximum increase will be £1·05 for the employee and £1·01 for the employer.

The self-employed

The flat-rate class 2 contribution will be raised to £4·75. Strict application of the formula for calculating self-employed contributions which has operated since 1977 would have meant a class 2 rate of £5·05 but I have thought it right to continue — and indeed increase — the modest relief to the small businessman while remaining within the broad framework of the formula. The rate of the class 4 contribution is not being increased and the annual limits of profits between which class 4 contributions are paid are being raised from £3,950 and £13,000 to £4,150 and £13,780 respectively.

The effect of these changes is that for self-employed people who only pay class 2 contributions there will be an annual increase of £7·80 but for those with profits between £4,150 and £13,000 there will be a reduction of £4·80 a year, assuming the same level of profits as in 1984-85. For those with profits of or above £13,780, the new upper profits limit, the increase will be £44·34 a year.

Class 3 (Voluntary) Contributions

The rate of class 3 contributions is to be raised from £4·50 to £4·65.

Rate of Treasury Supplement

The Treasury supplement to the national insurance fund is being reduced from 11 per cent. to 9 per cent. In recent years the consolidated fund has been meeting an increasing share of social security expenditure.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Synthetic Resins Ltd, Liverpool

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has had any consultations with Scott Bader about the proposed closure of Synthetic Resins Ltd in Liverpool

Mr. Trippier: No, but officials from the Merseyside office of my Department have discussed the matter with the local management.

Alvey Programme

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied that the United States Government will not seek to enforce their Export Administration Act over products and expertise arising from projects under the Alvey programme in which United States controlled companies have participated or may participate.

Mr. Channon: Contracts and grants under the Alvey programme are for research carried out in the United Kingdom. As a matter of United Kingdom law, United States export controls have no force in the United Kingdom and Her Majesty's Government will continue to resist attempts by the United States Administration to apply their controls within the United Kingdom.

Fireworks

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration the Government are giving to a review of fireworks controls; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher It is the Government's intention to revise the legislation so that magistrates can impose heavier penalties for selling fireworks to young people under 16 and for letting them off in a public place. As things stand I am not convinced of the need for further controls but I will keep the situation under review.

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to prohibit the sale of fireworks to the general public.

Mr. Fletcher: Family firework parties are a traditional British institution enjoyed by millions, and as things stand I am not prepared to deny people this pleasure because of abuse or carelessness by a few. However I will keep this situation under review.

European Community (Research Council)

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress was made at the meeting of the Research Council of European Community Ministers on 6 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: The Community's Council of Ministers (Research) met on 6 November 1984 in Brussels; I represented Her Majesty's Government. The Council held a constructive exchange of views on the approach it would adopt to the various proposals for research programmes currently under discussion, given the present budgetary and financial constraints in the Community. The specific research proposals were not discussed individually, but the Council will return to them, following detailed work by the Presidency and the Commission, at its next meeting in December.

Toys (Safety)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will consider including crossbows, powerful catapults and other potentially dangerous toys in the review of regulations on framing new safety guidelines; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: Certainly. That part of British Standard BS 5665, Safety of Toys, which sets requirements for toy guns also covers other projectile toys such as crossbows, pea-shooters and darts. There is a possible grey area between projectile toys and sporting equipment. My officials, in conjunction with other Departments as necessary, are reviewing all aspects of current legal requirements and published standards for these products and will seek improvements where appropriate.

Chatsworth Collection (Export Licences)

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will state (a) the total number of export licences actually issued in respect of 61 drawings sold at auction on 3 July from the Chatsworth collection, together with the total value applicable to them and (b) the total number of items for which export licences have been temporarily withheld, together with the total value applicable to them.

Mr. Channon: Licences have been temporarily withheld, on the advice of the reviewing committee on the export of works of art, for 13 items having a total value of £13,360,480. Licences for the remaining items have been issued in normal course. The value of these items is a matter of commercial confidentiality.

Nationalised Industries (Consumer Councils)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he plans to introduce reforms to the constitution of nationalised industries consumer councils.

Mr. Fletcher: In 1982 my Department published a paper entitled "The Nationalised Industry Consumer Councils: A Strategy for Reform", outlining the Government's intentions for improvements in the structure and organisation of such councils. A number of the proposals in that document have already been implemented and action on others is in hand.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to require the nationalised industries to engage in consultation with the consumer councils covering their industries, as the councils demand.

Mr. Fletcher: The nationalised industries do already consult their respective consumer councils on a range of issues. The consumer councils will be reviewing their consultative arrangements with their industries in agreeing the operating guidelines foreshadowed in paragraphs 19-20 of the "Strategy for Reform" paper.

Radio Investigation Service

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he intends to increase the staff of the radio investigation service.

Mr. Butcher: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Spain (Motor Vehicles)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about new Government initiatives to introduce fair competition and an equalisation of tariffs in motor vehicle exports to, and imports from, Spain.

Mr. Channon: The key to fair competition in trade in motor vehicles with Spain lies in her negotiations for entry into the European Community. The Community has now made its position clear. Under pressure from Her Majesty's Government it calls for special provision for tariffs on cars to secure a substantial improvement for entry into the Spanish market as from accession.

Price Waterhouse and Deloitte Haskins and Sells (Merger)

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will refer the proposed merger between Price Waterhouse and Deloitte Haskins and Sells to the Office of Fair Trading under the Restrictive Practices and Monopolies and Mergers Acts.

Mr. Fletcher: This proposed merger is under consideration by the Office of Fair Trading. In accordance with the provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973, my right hon. Friend will decide in the light of advice from the Director General of Fair Trading whether to refer it to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has had from the senior partner of Price Waterhouse about its proposed merger with Deloitte Haskins and Sells.

Mr. Fletcher: Representations made to the Secretary of State regarding mergers are confidential.

Cash Limits

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes have been made in the cash limit which is to be applied in the current financial year to the provision under class IV, vote 6, Scientific and Technological Assistance (Department of Trade and Industry).

Mr. Pattie: The outturn on this Vote for 1983-84 showed expenditure of £211,000 in excess of that year's cash limit. The overspend arose as a result of shortcomings in the day-to-day operation of financial control systems, which are now being improved. In accordance with normal practice, the cash limit on this Vote for this financial year will now be reduced by the amount of the previous year's overspend. The new cash limit will therefore be reduced by £211,000 from £378,178,000 to £377,967,000.

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any changes to announce in the cash limit for class IV, vote 2, covering miscellaneous support services.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I propose to reduce the cash limit for class IV, vote 2 by £1,467,000 from £87,195,000 to £85,728,000. The reduction will be used to offset in part the overspend on regional and selective assistance on class IV vote 1.

Strategic Minerals (Stockpile)

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether it is the Government's intention to continue maintaining a stockpile of strategic minerals.

Mr. Trippier: The Government have decided that it is no longer necessary to hold a mineral stockpile and will be disposing of it over the next few years.

Research and Development

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he is satisfied that enough is being done to encourage more private sector resources to be devoted to research and development.

Mr. Pattie: The Government place considerable emphasis on the need to encourage industrial research and development and has taken practical steps to support it. The number of research and development projects approved for assistance under the Science and Technology Act increased from 356 in 1979-80 to 1612 in 1983-84. The funds allocated for general industrial research and development support grew from £60 million to £200 million over the same period.

Our measures have had a significant and widespread impact. Industry now better appreciates the importance of research and development for its future viability. This together with the improvement over the last three years in profitability and liquidity in industry and commerce has resulted in increased demand for Government support for research and development. In consequence the 1985-86 allocation for innovation grants is now virtually committed.

In view of this I have decided to review the balance of the Department's support for industrial research and development. Whilst this is being undertaken and with immediate effect no further application will be accepted for:

research and development projects from individual firms on standard support for innovation terms development and investment projects under the microelectronics industry support scheme and the fibre-optics and opto-electronics scheme and application, development and installation projects for flexible manufacturing systems and robots.

Formal applications that have already been received by the Department will be processed within the limited funds still available.

The review will be completed within five months. I will announce the conclusions at that time. That will also be the occasion for introducing the new arrangements for regrouping all the Department's assistance schemes announced by my right hon. Friend on 27 July.

Minerals (Green Book)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Green Book on minerals is expected to be published.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have been asked to reply.

Consultation on all chapters of the draft new edition of the Green Book (including the policy chapter) has now been completed. Its publication remains dependent on the making of regulations for the abatement of compensation under the Town and Country Planning (Minerals) Act 1981 and the introduction of minerals amendments to the General Development Order 1977. I hope that both these items of legislation can be successfully concluded within the current parliamentary Session. The new edition of the Green Book will be published as soon as possible thereafter.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Cable Infrastructure (Capital Allowances)

Mr. Skeet asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will amend chapter II of the Finance Act 1984 to provide further capital allowances for the establishment of a cable infrastructure in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Moore: The capital allowance system has been reformed, amongst other reasons, to reduce discrimination between different assets and different sectors of the economy. My hon. Friend's proposal would not be consistent with that objective.

Alcoholic Drinks (Taxes and Duties)

Mr. Colvin asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the amount of revenue raised from taxes and duties on alcoholic drinks in the fiscal year 1983-84.

Mr. Hayhoe: Net receipts of excise duty on alcoholic drinks in 1983-84 were £4,075 million. It is estimated that VAT on alcoholic drinks yielded about £1,750 million.

Tax Revenue

Mr. Mudd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report (a) the revenue received in 1983-84, and (b) the latest estimates of revenue to be received in 1984-85 from the following taxes (i) fuel duty on petrol and derv sales, (ii) vehicle excise duty, (iii) car tax, (iv) value added tax on petrol and derv sales, and (v) value added tax on sales of vehicles.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given on 11 July to my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith).

Value Added Tax

Mr. Best asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue in a full year from the imposition of value added tax at the standard rate on each of (a) children's clothing, (b) children's shoes, (c) fuel, (d) all food currently zero-rated, (e) books and (f) newspapers and periodicals.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is estimated that the net additional full year revenue, at 1984-85 prices, would be about:

		£ million
(a)	Children's clothing	200
(b)	Children's footwear	50
(c)	Fuel	1,350
(d)	Food	3,500
(e)	Books	85
(f)	Newspapers and periodicals	290

Mr. Best asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect in a full year (a) on the increase of the retail price index and (b) on consequent increase in payment of benefits of the imposition of value added tax at the standard rate on: (i) books and (ii) newspapers and periodicals.

Mr. Hayhoe: The impact effect on the RPI is estimated to be less than 0·1 per cent. for books, and about 0·2 per cent. for newspapers and periodicals.

Each 1 per cent. increase in social security benefit rates is estimated to cost about £350 million in a full year.

Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representation he has received about value added tax on books; and what support he expects for such a proposal.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 22 October 1984 to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) at column 464. I cannot usefully comment on the degree of public support such a proposal might or might not receive, but the many representations on this subject have been carefully noted.

Mr. Corbett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report the amount of value added tax paid since 1 May to the latest convenient date in respect of hot food and drink purchased from take-aways.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 9 November 1984, c. 18]: Value added tax paid in respect of hot take-away food and drink is not separately identified in Customs and Excise accounts. Estimates of the amounts paid have to be based on consumer expenditure data, and information on expenditure after the Budget change will not be available for some time. I have no reason to depart from the estimates given in footnote (aa) to table 4.2 of this year's Financial Statement and Budget Report.

Inflation

Mr. Proctor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current rate of inflation; and if he will make a statement on his policies to reduce it.

Mr. Peter Rees: The retail price index rose 4·7 per cent. in the 12 months to September. The Government intend to maintain the financial discipline necessary to reduce inflation further.

European Community (Own Resources Payments)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about an advance of own resources payments to the European Communities in October.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Commission has, in accordance with article 10(2) of Council Regulation 2891/77, invited member states to advance from 20 December to 20 November payments of own resources other than VAT in respect of agricultural, sugar and isoglucose levies and customs duties collected by the Government on their behalf in October. The Government are complying with this request. This advance follows the previous one from 20 November to 22 October which was announced to the House on 22 October (WA 467-468).

The advance will reduce the Commission's cash flow difficulties and enable the Commission to pay from the budget to recipients in the United Kingdom and other member states.

Pending parliamentary approval of a Winter Supplementary Estimate, payment of £130 million will be made by a repayable advance from the contingencies fund. The payment of levies and duties on 20 December 1984 which is made directly from the consolidated fund under section 2(3) of the European Communities Act 1972 will be reduced by the amount of the advance. There will therefore be no net addition to public expenditure.

Any further requests for advances will be considered in the light of the then prevailing circumstances.

Fontainebleau Agreement

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out the detailed conditions necessary to satisfy the financial mechanisms required by the Government arising from the Fontainebleau agreement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Pension Funds (Withdrawals)

Mr. Winnick asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is intended to make lump sum withdrawals from pension funds subject to tax at retirement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I am aware of the recent speculation on this subject. Our normal policy is not to comment on such speculation.

"Official Report"

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement as to the reasons for the delay in publication of the bound copies of the Official Report, sixth series.

Mr. Hayhoe: I understand that a change in the system for compiling indexes led to a serious delay in the delivery of copy to Her Majesty's Stationery Office. However, volume 52 is due to be published on 7 December. Officials of the House and HMSO are urgently considering how best to improve the position.

Funding

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the extent of overfunding or underfunding for each quarter since the beginning of 1982; what have been the total sales of commercial bills for each quarter over the same period; and what has been the sterling index, the level of industrial production and the level of real wages for each quarter over the same period.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

National Health Service

Mr. Coombs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will announce revised cash limits for the National Health Service for 1984-85 to take account of the pay awards to staff who are not covered by the pay review bodies.

Mr. Peter Rees: Yes. As announced on 17 October by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services cash limits for the NHS will be increased to take account of part of the increased cost arising from these pay awards. Part of the additional cost will be found from efficiency savings within the service. The balance will be charged to the Reserve and has been taken into account in the estimated outturn of the public expenditure planning total for 1984-85 given in the autumn statement on 12 November 1984. The changes, which, for the voted cash limits, are subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, are as follows:

Department	Vote/cash block	Current cash limit	Increase for pay	Other changes	Revised cash limit
		'000s	'000s	'000s	'000s
Department of Health and Social Security	XI. 1	8,962,607	29,370	—	8,991,977
Scottish Office	XV. 14	1,448,719	3,850	—	1,452,569
Welsh Office	XVI. 1	752,144	1,943	*−2,025	752,062
		£ million	£ million	£ million	£ million
Northern Ireland Departments	NID 1	†2,059·5	†1·3	††1·7	†2,062·5

* This reduction results from savings found on the roads and transport programme and offsets overspend on selective financial assistance on class XVI vote 3.

† Figures for Northern Ireland are rounded to the nearest £0·1 million.

‡ Details of the expenditure made available for the Milk supplementary levy (outgoers) scheme are given by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in a written answer of today's date.

CIVIL SERVICE

Video Display Units

Mr. Skinner asked the Minister for the Civil Service whether he will now publish the results of the Civil Service Medical Advisory Service's research into the dangers of video display units to pregnant women operators.

Mr. Hayhoe: The Civil Service Medical Advisory Service will be presenting the report of a survey of visual display unit operators in Runcorn to the international meeting on allegations of reproductive hazards from visual display units organised by Humane Technology, an independent specialist consultancy, in London on 29-30 November 1984.

The report and ensuing discussion will be published after the meeting.

ENERGY

Electricity Costs

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the extra cost per unit of producing electricity by burning oil in the power stations compared with the cost in those stations which are using coal.

Mr. Goodlad: The additional cost of generating electricity from oil-fired power stations as a result of the coal dispute varies according to the overall level of demand on the system at a given time and other factors. The extra costs cannot be fully assessed until the dispute is over.

Coal Prices

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for Germany, France, Belgium and Holland such information as he has as to the latest available figures showing the price of coal, the amount of subsidy per tonne, and the estimated cost of producing each tonne: and if he will compare this with the United Kingdom coal industry.

Mr. David Hunt: No recent comparative information is available. It has been announced that France intends to halve its coal industry over the next five years and to reduce employment in its coal industry by the same proportion.

The last set of comparative figures which are available relate to 1982. At that time the investment finance available to the coal industry in the United Kingdom was £736 million, compared with £231 million in the Federal Republic of Germany, £47 million in France and £19 million in Belgium.

Doubtless due to this heavy investment, production costs in Britain were lower than in the other countries. Production costs per tonne were £47 in the United Kingdom, £51·50 in Germany, £54·30 in France and £53·90 in Belgium. Production subsidies were provided by each country to bring their production costs into line with the prices at which their coal could be sol . In 1982 the revenue received per tonne was £38·10 in the United Kingdom, £37·50 in France, £39·20 in Belgium and £45·40 in the Federal Republic of Germany.

There is no doubt that, in the period since 1982, the massive gap between the investment finance provided by Britain and by other European countries has further widened, and the British investment programme in coal will have been more than double the investment made by the rest of the European Community put together.

Nuclear Power Stations (Protection)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether Her Majesty's Government require nuclear power stations in the United Kingdom to be designed to withstand direct hits on the reactor core from all known aerial bombs and high-explosive missiles.

Mr. Goodlad: It is not a formal requirement for nuclear power stations in the United Kingdom to be required to withstand bombardment from all known aerial bombs and high-explosive missiles. However the general safety requirement for protection against external hazards is such as to give a considerable degree of protection against weapons. The reactor core itself is extremely well-protected by steel and concrete structures but there is no guarantee that it would not be damaged by a nuclear weapon. As my right hon. Friend the then Minister of State at the Home Office explained to the House on 24

November 1982 at column 494 a direct hit by a nuclear weapon on a nuclear installation would cause no significant enhancement of blast, heat, or initial radiation.

NCB (Deficit Grant Payment)

Mr. Lester asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a statement about authority for deficit grant payments to the National Coal Board.

Mr. Peter Walker: The present provision in Estimates approved by this House for deficit payments to the NCB during 1984-85 is £795 million. This provision was based on the deficit in 1984-85 foreseen before the strike, plus the outstanding element of the deficit in 1983-84.

The summer Supplementary Estimate for NCB deficit grant contained a footnote explaining that payment of the full amount in the Estimate required an order under Section 3(4) of the Coal Industry Act 1980 increasing the aggregate amount of deficit grant authorised under the Act. I am laying such an order before the House in draft today.

The Government also intend to present a winter Supplementary Estimate for a further £607 million of deficit grant within the proposed new ceiling of £2,000 million.

Cash Limits

Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give details of any changes to his Department's cash limit.

Mr. Peter Walker: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit of class IV, vote 5 will be increased by £45 million to £142,869,000.

That increase represents provision for a grant to the British National Oil Corporation the reasons for which were explained in the minute which my Department laid before the House on 23 October.

The increase of £45 million in BNOC's external financing requirement will be charged to the reserve and has been taken into account in the estimated outturn for the total of public expenditure for 1984-85 given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his autumn statement on 12 November 1984. The corporation's external financing requirement for 1984-85 is revised from minus £4 million to £41 million.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what is the latest figure for youth unemployment in the Liverpool travel-to-work area;

(2) what are the latest figures for female unemployment in the Liverpool travel-to-work area;

(3) what are the latest figures for male unemployment in the Liverpool travel-to-work area.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested for the new travel-to-work area will become available next year. Corresponding data for the old Liverpool travel-to-work area are available in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the percentage of unemployment among blind people of working age, namely, men under 65 years and women under 60 years.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is not available.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give the number of those aged under 20 years who were unemployed in (a) the county of Lancashire and (b) the borough of Burnley in May 1979 and at the latest available date; and what is the percentage increase.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information on the age of claimant unemployed in administrative districts and counties will become available next year. Corresponding data for the old travel-to-work areas in the county of Lancashire are available in the House of Commons Library. The figures for 1979 are not directly comparable with current statistics because of the October 1982 change in the basis of the count.

Manufacturing Industries

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of people employed in United Kingdom manufacturing industries now as compared to the same date in 1983.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest estimate is for June 1984, when the number of employees in employment in manufacturing industries in the United Kingdom was 5,581,700. The corresponding number in June 1983 was 5,641,200.

Welwyn Hatfield Constituency

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will reconsider the inclusion of the Welwyn Hatfield constituency in the revised travel-to-work area of Luton and Watford; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: No. The Welwyn Hatfield constituency, with the exception of the Wheathampstead ward, which is in the Watford and Luton travel-to-work area, forms part of the Hertford and Harlow travel-to-work area. The relevant travel-to-work area boundary is based on an analysis of the travel to work patternsn shown by the 1981 census of population as described in a supplement published with the September edition of Employment Gazette, a copy of which is in the Library.

The census data show that the part of the constituency which is in the Hertford and Harlow travel-to-work area has more work journeys to or from the rest of that travel-to-work area than to or from the Watford and Luton travel-to-work area. The same source shows that there are more journeys between Wheathampstead and the rest of the Watford and Luton travel-to-work area than between Wheathampstead and the Hertford and harlow travel-to-work area.

Textile Firms (Inspectors)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many extra factory and wages inspectors will be hired to undertake the extra visits to the premises of textile firms recently announced by his Department.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The special inspection initiative concerning textile and clothing factories in the west Midlands, Leicester and East London, announced on September 10, is being undertaken by existing staff. Allocation of inspectors to particular blocks of work is dealt with flexibly in response to changing needs and staff are not in general recruited for specific purposes such as this campaign.

Video Display Units

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will now undertake a comprehensive study into the possible health hazards to operators of video display units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Health and Safety Executive has published a research paper on the human aspects of visual display units and a guidance book. Both publications consider health aspects. The executive is currently preparing a pamphlet for operators which will deal with health aspects, including those relating to women in pregnancy.

The executive is also monitoring the progress of a number of current studies into the possible health effects of using VDUs. The possibility of funding further research is being considered.

Ault and Wiborg Paint Factory, Perivale

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Employment if the Health and Safety Executive is satisfied with the current and proposed standards of health and safety at the Ault and Wiborg paint factory in Perivale; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am advised that the Health and Safety Executive is actively discussing health and safety standards with the management at this factory. I am satisfied that steps are being taken to ensure that the standards are acceptable.

Wages

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Employment if, in respect of the consultations he is to carry out in respect of proposals for the protection of wages legislation, he will list the organisations and individuals that responded to the original consultative document, indicating (a) those who broadly supported repeal of the existing right of manual workers to be paid in cash and (b) those expressing concern about malpractice in respect of deductions from pay.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department received over 100 letters from organisations of employers and workers, and from other bodies, in response to the original consultative document issued in March 1983. Of the five options put forward in the paper, a substantial majority of respondents favoured repeal of the Truck Acts with the enactment of up-to-date legislation to protect workers from arbitrary deductions from wages. Those views were taken into account when preparing the more detailed legislative proposals concerning deductions from pay issued for consultation on 31 October.

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report details of the legislative and administrative measures which have been adopted by the other member states of the European Community for the implementation of their obligations relating to low pay and minimum wages under the convention of the International Labour Organisation.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In addition to the United Kingdom the following member states of the European Community have ratified international labour convention No. 26 concerning the creation of minimum wage fixing machinery — Belgium, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Republic of Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg and the Netherlands. Details of the legislative and administrative measures used to apply the convention in individual member states are not readily available, without disproportionate cost.

Newham (Training)

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many men and women, listed separately, are on special employment or training measures in (a) the London borough of Newham and (b) the Constituency of Newham, North-East.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Some 3,200 people are benefiting from the employment and training measures in the London borough of Newham, although because of the various bases on which local information is collated, an unknown proportion will be in areas outside the borough and the hon. Member's constituency. I am unable to provide a separate number for men and women on these measures in the borough without incurring disproportionate cost.

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people left school last September in the London borough of Newham; how many ment on to further education; how many got jobs; how many went on to youth training schemes; and how many are unemployed.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Available statistics from the Newham careers service shows that 2,312 16-year-olds left school in the London borough of Newham in the academic year ending 31 August 1984. The other information requested will not be available until a survey by the careers service to establish the destinations of these school leavers is completed in December.

Agricultural Workers (Fatalities and Injuries)

Viscount Cranborne asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many agricultural workers have been killed and injured through contact with overhead power cables in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: During 1983 seven agricultural workers were injured through contact with overhead power cables, none of them fatally.

Race Relations Act 1976

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he plans to introduce legislation to amend the Race Relations Act 1976 in respect of the code of practice for the elimination of racial discrimination and the promotion of equality of opportunity in employment, published by the Commission for Racial Equality.

Mr. Alan Clark: It remains our intention to amend section 47 of the Race Relations Act to enable the Secretary of State to amend codes of practice before their presentation to Parliament for approval. My right hon. Friend will make an announcement in due course.

Careers Advice

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the current level of careers advice available in secondary schools.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The provision of careers advice in secondary schools is the responsibility of local education authorities. If the hon. Member knows of any particular problems I and my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Education and Science, would be pleased to hear from him.

Average Wage

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current national average wage.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest figures on the average earnings of full time adult employees working a full week relate to April 1984 and are given in table 1 of "New Earnings Survey", 1984 part A, a copy of which is in the Library.

European Social Fund (Fife)

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proposals for schemes have been submitted by his Department in the last three months on behalf of Fife regional council for consideration for support under the European social fund; what is the potential number of young people who may benefit from these schemes; and when he expects a determination of these applications.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The deadline for the submission of 1985 applications to the European social fund was 22 October. The Department submitted 10 applications for support under the fund on behalf of Fife regional council. They are listed below:

	Number of Beneficiaries
Schemes for young people aged under 25:
Employment subsidy scheme	225
Business training for young people	24
Preliminary training for handicapped young people	45
Vocational training for handicapped young people	24
Training in Levenmouth enterprise centre	60
Total	378
Schemes for adults aged over 25:
Employment subsidy scheme	175
Enterprise training for small and medium-sized firms	48
Preliminary vocational training for women	48
Vocational training fkor women	48
Training in Levenmouth enterprise centre	40
Total	359

The European Commission's decisions on 1985 applications are expected next March.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) why unemployment benefits are being denied to persons who are out of work as a consequence of the coal mining dispute and are not directly involved in the strike; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many persons in Barnsley and district are employed by AMCO Industrial Holdings Ltd. are being denied unemployment benefits because they have been laid off as a result of the coal mining dispute; by what statutory powers these payments are being denied; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The benefit entitlement of someone who loses employment as a result of a trade dispute is governed by section 19 of the Social Security Act 1975. Decisions on claims are made by the independent adjudicating authorities.

A total of 238 people in Barnsley and district employed by AMCO Industrial Holdings have been disqualified from receiving benefit.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) excluding those employees who represent the additionality factor in mode A of the youth training scheme, what is the latest figure for the numbers and percentages of youth training scheme trainees in (a) Scotland and (b) Great Britain who have secured permanent employment;

(2) what proportion of youth training scheme entrants who have completed a full year's traning (a) secure regular work and (b) are unemployed in (i) Scotland and (ii) Great Britain.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Detailed comprehensive information on the destinations of youngsters leaving the youth training scheme is not available. However, a recent sample survey showed that 58 per cent. of those leavers responding went into employment and a further 13 per cent. either went into or intended to go into further training or education. A copy of the paper containing the detailed results of this sample survey has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will describe the basis on which he calculates that 70 per cent. or more of youth trainees have secured work or further training, and provide the total figures on which this calculation is based.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The latest calculations on the destinations of youth training scheme leavers are based on the paper entitled "YTS Leavers", a copy of which has been placed in the Library. This paper includes a breakdown of the various destinations of leavers obtained from the recent sample survey of 3,500 young people in nine Manpower Services Commission areas who left individual programmes within the youth training scheme between 1 April and 31 July. The survey showed that 58 per cent. of the young people were in work and that a further 13 per cent. were in, or intending to go into, further training or education.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make it a condition of renewal of the youth training scheme that the sponsors observe equal opportunity policies.

Mr. Peter Morrison: All contracts between the Manpower Services Commission and managing agents and sponsors include a clause requiring them to observe equal opportunities policy. Youngsters on the youth training scheme are covered by the Race Relations Act 1976 and the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 in respect of recruitment to, and termination from, the youth training scheme.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will ask the Manpower Services Commission to make full use of the Commission for Racial Equality and local community relations councils when implementing equal opportunity policy in the youth training scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission will continue to use the Commission for Racial Equality and the local community relations councils as a source of advice, and guidance will be issued to managing agents and sponsors who participate in the youth training scheme to recognise this source of advice in implementing equal opportunities.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what steps he will take to see that the recommendations given by University of Bristol staff to the Manpower Services Commission are put into effect with respect to equal opportunities and the youth training scheme;

(2) whether he has considered the report on ethnic minorities and the youth training scheme prepared by Bristol university staff for the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I understand that the report is presently under consideration by the Manpower Services Commission.

Work Permits

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many work permits were issued in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983, respectively.

Mr. Alan Clark: The number of work permits issued in the years 1979 to 1983 were as follows:

Year	Employment expected to last 11 months or more	Employment expected to last less than 11 months	Total
1979	8,344	9,649	17,993
1980	6,423	8,238	14,661
1981	5,780	6,983	12,763
1982	5,569	7,328	12,897
1983	5,818	7,728	13,546

Information Technology Centres

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has recently received on the funding of information technology centres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have not recently received any representations which directly concern the general basis on which information technology centres are funded.

Employment and Training Act 1973

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce legislation to govern the form of directions given under the Employment and Training Act 1973.

Mr. Tom King: No.

Manpower Services Commission (Racial Discrimination)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what further measures he is planning to eliminate racial discrimination from all aspects of the operation of Manpower Services Commission schemes in the light of the recent report by the Commission for Racial Equality and the report by Bristol university staff prepared on behalf of the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I understand that both reports are currently under consideration by the Manpower Services Commission.

Area Manpower Boards

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take steps to increase minority representation on area manpower boards.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Redundancy Payments

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is now the average statutory redundancy payment; and what proportion of it is met from the redundancy fund.

Mr. Tom King: In the period April to September this year the average payment was £1,500. The redundancy fund pays a rebate of 41 per cent. to employers. I shall be introducing an order later in the Session to reduce that rebate to 35 per cent. as from next April.

Training Loans

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what progress he has made on the proposals on training loans in the White Paper "Training for Jobs".

Mr. Tom King: In the White Paper "Training for Jobs" we announced our intention of examining the possibility of introducing a scheme of loans for adult trainees who want to undertake training of their own choice. I am today publishing a consultative paper on training loans which sets out our view of how an experimental scheme might operate. Copies of the consultative paper are available in the Vote Office.

Community Programme

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of women employed on the Manpower Services Commission's community programme; what percentage of the total community programme work force are women; and, of these, how many were in receipt of benefit before joining the scheme.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 9 November 1984, c. 28]: Information is collected monthly about entrants to the community programme. Over the 12 months up to 28 September, 23 per cent. of entrants were woman; a total of 34,450. Over 85 per cent. of entrants were themselves in receipt of benefit immediately before joining the programme and, on the basis of a sample survey of participants in October 1983, just over half of those not receiving benefits directly would be women. However, some would be indirect recipients and in the rule changes to the programme which came into effect on 1 October, we provided that where unemployment or supplementary benefit is claimed by the head of the household and includes an element of payment for an unemployed spouse, that spouse will be regarded as a benefit recipient for the purposes of eligibility.

NORTHERN IRELAND

National Health Service

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were employed in the National Health Service in the Province at the latest date; what were the figures for June 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Health and personal social services are fully integrated in Northern Ireland and the total number of staff employed at the relevant dates were:—
30 June 1979—60,606 (44,545 whole-time equivalent)
30 September 1984 — 67,001 (49,207 whole-time equivalent)

Doctors

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many doctors were employed in the National Health Service in the Province at the latest date; what were the figures for June 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information is as follows:—
September 1984—1,880
June 1979—1,730
These figures include doctors working in the hospital service and in community health and community medicine and some general practitioners who undertake part-time community health or hospital work. General practitioners are independent contractors and therefore are not included in these figures unless they also hold part-time hospital or community health appointments.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many doctors were unemployed in the Province at the latest available date: and what the comparable figures were for June 1979.

Mr. Chris Patten: The information requested is not available.

Driving Licences

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many driving licences issued by the Department of the Environment (N.I.) are currently in use in the Province.

Mr. Chris Patten: A total of 574,158 persons currently hold a full Northern Ireland driving licence; 73,476 hold a provisional driving licence.

Voluntary Schools

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much land has been vested on behalf of voluntary schools under article 10 of the Northern Ireland Education Order 1978; and whether any such scheme is presently under consideration.

Mr. Scott: No land has been vested and no proposals are at present under consideration.

TRANSPORT

Manchester Airport

14. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about progress towards a rail link to Manchester international airport.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand British Rail and the Manchester International Airport Authority are awaiting the results of further evaluation studies before deciding whether to pursue the project further.

London (Dial-a-Ride)

17. Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussion he has had with London borough councils as to the future of the dial-a-ride service.

Mrs. Chalker: My Department is holding discussions now with representatives of the London boroughs about future arrangements for funding dial-a-ride and other services for disabled people.

M65 Motorway

19. Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made in appointing the consultants in respect of the Blackburn/M6-M61 section of the M65 motorway; and when they are expected to report.

Mrs. Chalker: Messrs. Howard Humphreys and Partners have been appointed as consulting engineers and were given details of their commission last month. We have asked them to prepare a detailed report on all aspects of the new all-purpose road south of Blackburn within 12 months so that we can then take decisions about the preferred route.

Transport Supplementary Grant

20. Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consultations he has had with the passenger transport executives concerning the proposed changes in allocation of transport supplementary grant under section 20 of the Transport Act 1968.

Mr. Ridley: None, TSG is not paid to PTEs, but to metropolitan county councils and the GLC (as well as to shire counties). I refer to my reply to the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) earlier this afternoon—I consulted the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, among others.

41. Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much was spent on section 20 grants within the transport supplementary grant in the financial year 1984-85.

Mrs. Chalker: In the 1984-85 transport supplementary grant settlement for England my right hon. Friend accepted £53·4 million of metropolitan county councils' estimated expenditure on support for local rail services. Because TSG is a block grant, it is not possible to identify any part of it with support paid by the metropolitan county councils to PTEs for local rail services.

59. Mr. Conlan asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the effect of the withdrawal of transport supplementary grant from certain classes of capital expenditure, such as car parks and many local roads on the feasibility of financing such expenditure.

Mrs. Chalker: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary order, capital expenditure on many major road schemes will be supported with transport supplementary grant at the rate of 50 per cent. in 1985-86—this should go a long way towards financing the most expensive items in local authorities' highways capital programmes. Authorities have always financed the larger part of their transport capital expenditure themselves with the help of the rate support grant and there is no reason why they should not continue to finance comprehensive highways capital programmes within the resources available to them.

Motorways (Speed Limits)

21. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will consider raising the speed limit for cars using Britain's motorways.

29. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will review the speed limits on motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: A review of the national motorway speed limit was carried out this year. We concluded that the limit should remain at 70 mph. It would be premature to review the matter again so soon.

West Midlands (Northern Relief Route)

23. Mr. Maude asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce a decision on the suggested northern relief route for the west midlands.

Mrs. Chalker: I hope that the choice of preferred route following the public consultation will be announced early next year.

Railways (Electrification)

25. Dr. Mawhinney asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest estimated cost of electrifying the east coast main line.

Mr. David Mitchell: The electrification of the east coast main line was approved at a cost of £306 million at 1983 fourth quarter prices. British Rail does not expect the cost to exceed this figure but it does have to find the money from within its own resources.

53. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he proposes to increase resources available to British Rail to enable the board to electrify lines between Manchester, Liverpool, Preston and Blackpool.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Government are ready to approve worthwhile investments which offer a sound prospect for improving the financial performance of the railways. However, it is for BR to decide its investment priorities and whether to bring forward specific schemes. It has made no proposals to me for the schemes mentioned by the hon. Member.

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now announce his decision on electrification of the North London line.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have now written to the chairman of British Rail giving our consent to the electrification of the 6-mile freight route between Camden road junction and Stratford, together with some freight terminals in north east London and Essex, and the purchase of four locomotives, at a total cost of £12·149 million. Our decision was based on an appraisal that showed the board's proposal to be justified on its financial merits.

Freight Handling Costs

26. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the relative costs of handling freight at (a) scheme ports (b) non-scheme ports and (c) ports in Holland and Belgium.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department does not have such information, much of which is commercially confidential.

Helicopters

27. Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on priority areas for improving helicopter safety.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Present and future helicopter airworthiness certification standards have been reviewed in depth by the Helicopter Airworthiness Review Panel (HARP) formed by the Airworthiness Requirements Board. Its report was published in June this year and makes 15 recommendations with emphasis on improvements in crashworthiness, sea survivability and reliability of rotor and transmission systems. Preliminary action is being taken on those capable of being implemented in the short term and actions are being planned on the remainder.

The trial track structure to and from Aberdeen has reduced the number of airmisses reported between helicopter and military aircraft; the trial is being extended through the winter months to determine its effectiveness when icing conditions force helicopters to fly at much lower heights. Revisions have also been introduced to the procedures for military aircraft at the Rosehearty bombing range. With the increasing helicopter activity in the Humberside area, the Ministry of Defence and the national air traffic services are currently developing procedures to integrate the activities of civil helicopters and military aircraft.

Private Roads (Humps)

28. Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will amend the appropriate regulations to exempt private roads from the requirement to illuminate road humps.

Mrs. Chalker: Private roads which are not highways, are exempt from the provisions of the road humps regulations, though I would hope that the spirit of the regulations would be followed. Lighting is important to ensure that humps are clearly seen by motorists.

Buses (White Paper)

30. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many organisations have submitted comments on the White Paper, "Buses," Cmnd. 9300.

36. Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on his White Paper, "Buses"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has had in connection with the White Paper, "Buses".

57. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received following the publication of the White Paper, "Buses".

58. Mr. Martin asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received concerning the White Paper, "Buses".

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has had on the White Paper, "Buses".

Mr. David Mitchell: I refer my hon. Friends and the hon. Gentlemen to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) earlier today.

38. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will arrange for the supply and distribution of his Department's leaflet, "Buses: a guide to the White Paper", to residents in Southampton.

Mr. David Mitchell: No, but a copy is available to any individual who asks for one.

49. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received from individual taxi drivers and their representative bodies on the proposals in his recent White Paper, "Buses".

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received over 300 representations from individual taxi drivers and their associations. All but 95 of these consisted of a common printed text.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library all the replies to the White Paper, "Buses".

Mr. David Mitchell: No.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on his White Paper, "Buses", Cmnd. 9300.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received around 2,000 representations on the White Paper and on the consultation documents which my Department issued following the publication of the White Paper.

As announced in the Gracious Speech we will be bringing forward a Bill later in this Session to implement the proposals. The representations we have received are being studied by my Department as part of the preparation of that Bill.

GLC Lorry Ban

31. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the effect on businesses of the implementation of the Greater London (Restriction of Goods Vehicles) Traffic Order.

Mr. Ridley: I have so far seen no adequate justification by the GLC of its proposals or detailed assessment of the effects. What is clear is that hundreds of firms and trade associations have written voicing concern over the potential impact of the proposals on jobs and prices in London.

34. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he proposes to take following the Greater London council's proposals for a night-time and weekends ban on heavy lorries.

48. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on the proposals by the Greater London council to ban lorries within the Greater London council area at night and week-ends; and what action he proposes to take on this matter.

Mr. Ridley: I have made clear my view that for a major London-wide proposal of this magnitude a properly constituted public inquiry would provide a well established democratic method of assessment.

I understand the GLC transport committee will be meeting on 21 November to consider the massive response to consultation and the many hundreds of calls for a public inquiry.

Liverpool Freeport

32. Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with the Mersey Docks and Harbour Company on the progress of the Liverpool freeport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The company showed me the site and discussed it briefly with me when I visited the port earlier this year. My right hon. Friend will also be visiting the port shortly. I understand that the freeport has been operational since the beginning of October and will be opened officially by Her Royal Highness Princess Anne on 29 November.

Air Fares

33. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress he has made in negotiating more competitive fares for air travelling in Europe.

Mr. Ridley: We want our airlines to be free to introduce more competitive fares wherever they see a market need which is not being adequately met. They now have that freedom between the United Kingdom and the Netherlands and some fares have come down to as little as £49 return as a result. Substantial reductions have also been obtained in fares to the Federal Republic of Germany. Except in the Netherlands, fares require the approval of both Governments. We are seeking to persuade our other partners in Europe that the approval of the country where the journey starts should be a sufficient safeguard against both monopoly exploitation and uneconomic dumping.

Motorways (Roadworks)

35. Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department has considered an effective system of cost benefit analysis for major roadworks on motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: We use sophisticated surveying techniques to determine when major motorway maintenance works are needed and the most cost-effective treatment required. In planning the works we always take account of the cost of traffic disruption.

Settle–Carlisle Line

37. Mr. Watson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what will be the date for the start of the public inquiry into the proposed closure of the Settle to Carlisle line.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Transport Act 1962 provides that the area transport users consultative committees with whom objections to a closure proposal have been lodged may decide to hear objections and representations orally.

I understand that in the case of the British Railways Board's proposal to withdraw passenger services over the Settle–Carlisle line, the TUCCs concerned are unlikely to be ready to hold public hearings before the spring, though this is of course a matter for them.

M25 (Reigate–Wisley)

39. Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will provide latest estimates for the dates when the three remaining M25 contracts in the south western quarter between Reigate and Wisley will be complete and the road open to traffic.

Mrs. Chalker: The contract completion dates for the Wisley–Leatherhead and Leatherhead–Reigate sections are 5 August and 26 August 1985, respectively. The Leatherhead interchange section was completed nine months early but it cannot be used without one of the adjoining sections. I expect the whole of the length between Reigate and Wisley to be opened to traffic next summer.

Rail Lines (Bus Substitution)

40. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he expects to introduce a Bill on the substitution of rail by bus services in the present Session of Parliament.

50. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he plans to introduce bus substitution for rail services in England.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans to encourage the substitution of buses for certain rail lines.

Mr. David Mitchell The House will be invited to approve enabling legislation this Session. Under it, when British Rail sought consent from the Secretary of State to the withdrawal of a railway service, it would be able to propose substitute bus services.

Municipal Bus Undertakings

42. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he intends municipal bus undertakings to become public limited companies or whether he proposes to seek privatisation.

Mr. Ridley: The intention is that initially district councils bus undertakings should be incorporated as limited liability companies, wholly owned by the parent authorities. It will be open to district councils to privatise the companies subsequently if they wish, though we are not seeking to require them to do so.

Channel and River Crossings

43. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if Her Majesty's Government will give priority to a second Severn crossing a third Dartford tunnel and the faster completion of the present trunk road programme over a Channel crossing.

Mrs. Chalker: The trunk road programme will be completed as quickly as the statutory procedures and necessary finance allow.

The need for a second Severn crossing has not been established but a study into how a second crossing might be provided—should it be needed—is under way and will be completed in 1986.

The Dartford tunnel is the responsibility of Essex and Kent county councils but traffic flows are being monitored and the need for extra capacity will be reviewed as necessary.

The Government have made clear that any scheme for a Channel fixed link would have to be financed entirely by the private sector and without any form of Government commercial guarantee.

London Regional Transport

44. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the chairman of London Regional Transport.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friend last met the chairman of London Regional Transport on 24 July 1984. I met him on 31 October 1984 and see him from time to time as necessary.

Rear Seat Belts

45. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will introduce legislation to make the wearing of rear seat belts compulsory.

Mrs. Chalker: I have no plans to introduce such legislation.

Cross-Channel Link

47. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Transport what developments there have been in the past three months over the provision of a fixed cross-Channel link.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that various groups are still considering the preparation of detailed financing proposals for a Channel fixed link, following the reply given by my right Hon. Friend on 22 May to my hon. Friends the Members for Maidstone (Sir J. Wells), and Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) at column 380-381. My right hon. Friend will be meeting the French Minister of Transport this week to consider what the next steps for the two Governments should be, if proposals meeting the conditions set out in our earlier statement are forthcoming.

Scottish Lowland Airports

Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will complete the review of Scotland's lowland airports.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Around the end of the year.

60. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding the "Review of Scottish Lowland Airport Policy".

Mr. Michael Spicer: Over 270 specific responses to the consultation document, and about 500 more general letters.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he now expects to complete the review of Scottish lowland airports.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Around the end of the year.

Rail Services (Expenditure)

52. Mr. Bagier asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total expenditure on rail services, under section 20 of the Transport Act 1968, in the most recent year for which information is available.

55. Mr. Ron Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total expenditure on rail services, under section 20 of the Transport Act 1968, in the most recent year for which information is available.

Mr. David Mitchell: The British Railways Board's annual report for 1983 shows payments of £77·8 million due in that year from passenger transport executives under section 20 of the Transport Act 1968.

Road and Rail Passenger Transport

54. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the Government's views on competition between road and rail passenger transport.

Mr. Ridley: Competition ensures that the consumer can choose the best services and the best prices. The Government are determined to widen the scope for competition wherever possible and this certainly includes competition between the various modes of transport.

Rail and Waterway Facilities

56. Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Transport what grant he has given in the current year for rail and waterway facilities; and what effects these have had on road traffic.

Mr. David Mitchell: So far this year I have approved 12 rail grants and one waterway grant. My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and Scotland have each approved two rail grants. When built and running at full potential it is anticipated that these projects will avoid more than 200,000 lorry movements a year on environmentally unsuitable roads.

Bus and Coach Operators

61. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will raise the operator's licence fee paid by bus and coach operators for each vehicle.

Mr. David Mitchell: The public service vehicles operator's licence fee is set at a figure which covers expenditure on administration and enforcement of operator licensing. Fees are now calculated at £42 per vehicle per year and this is kept under review.

M40 (Birmingham-Oxford)

62. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Transport when a decision on the M40 Birmingham-Oxford extension is now expected.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and the Environment are currently considering the report of the independent inspector who conducted public inquiries into the proposals between September 1982 and June 1983. We hope to announce our decisions around the end of the year.

Pedestrian Crossings (Prohibited Parking)

63. Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for Transport why zig-zag lines indicating that parking is prohibited ahead of pedestrian crossings are not also used ahead of traffic lights.

Mr. Ridley: The zig-zag lines at zebra crossings prohibit overtaking as well as parking. It would not be right to prohibit overtaking on the approaches to a junction controlled by traffic lights. Parking prohibitions on the approaches to traffic lights can be indicated by the use of yellow lines.

M25 (Reigate-Leatherhead)

64. Mr. George Gardiner asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the decision by Bovis Birse to cease work on the Reigate-Leatherhad interchange section of the M25 for six months, after having been granted a six-month extension for completion of the contract.

Mrs, Chalker: This contract follows the ICE Conditions of Contract (5th Edition). The Department's consultants who have an independent role as engineer to the contract have awarded extensions of time until 26 August 1985. It is for the contractor to decide his own programme to meet this date; if it is not met, liquidated damages will be payable. I expect the whole length of the M25 between Wisley and Reigate to be completed next summer.

Civil Engineering Work (VAT)

65. Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport what reduction in his Department's programme will be caused by the decision to extend value added tax liability to roads and other civil engineering work.

Mrs. Chalker: Latest estimates indicate that the reduction in resources available for the motorway and trunk road programme following the extension of value-added tax to alterations to civil engineering works will be not more than £3 million in total over this and the next financial year. This will not significantly affect the pace and momentum of the trunk road programme. From April 1985 all tax on highways works will be recoverable.

Road Freight Transport

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the latest forecasts for road freight transport in (a) million tonnes and (b) thousand million tonne kilometres for the years 1985, 1990, 1995, 2000, 2005 and 2010.

Mrs. Chalker: Uncertainty inevitably surrounds forecasts of road freight made many years into the future. For this reason the Department adopts a range of forecasts. The forecasts of goods carried by road which underlie the curent National Road Traffic Forecasts, published in July 1980, are as follows:

Road Freight

	million tonnes		billion tonnes-kms
	low	high	low	high
1985	1,505	1,515	109·4	116·8
1990	1,510	1,530	115·7	126·1
1995	1,515	1,545	119·1	132·6
2000	1,520	1,560	122·5	137·6

Forecasts of road freight traffic (vehicle-kms) beyond 2000 are produced by extrapolation: no forecasts of goods carried by road are available after that date.

These forecasts are currently under review.

Roads (Expenditure)

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will show regional expenditure on roads in the same format as table 1.13 in "Transport Statistics Great Britain 1972-82" for the years 1980-81, 1982-83 and 1983-84.

Mrs. Chalker: An equivalent table for 1982-83 will be included in Transport Statistics Great Britain, 1973-83, which is due to be published next month. Information for 1983-84 is not yet available, but a table is to be compiled for next years issue of Transport Statistics Great Britain. Figures for 1980-81 could only be produced at disproportionate cost.

Airports

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the bids for expenditure on airport improvements currently in his hands in respect of proposed capital expenditure in 1985-86.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Such bids are regarded as having been made in confidence and it is not the practice for the Government to publish them.

291 Plumstead High Street, London, SE18.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what references his Department obtained on the suitability of the applicants before letting 291 Plumstead High Street, London, SE18, for use as a hostel for homeless young men;

(2) when the letting of his Department's property at 291 Plumstead High Street, London, SE18, as a hostel for homeless youths commenced; what is the total sum now due in rent; and how much has so far been received.

Mrs. Chalker: References were obtained from the South East London Probation and After-Care Service, the applicants' bank and a local business.

The letting of this property as a hostel for homeless youths commenced on 18 April 1983. Following an initial three months rent-free period, during which an agreed schedule of repairs was carried out, a total of £4,959·77 arrears of rent has accrued and no moneys have been received.

A47 (Billesdon Bypass)

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he still anticipates that work on the A47 Billesdon bypass will commence in the current year.

Mrs. Chalker: Construction of the Billesdon bypass is now expected to start in the early summer of 1985.

Following a public inquiry into the scheme proposals, earlier this year, the inspector recommended minor modifications and consultations with those affected have now been successfully completed.

Motorways

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many kilometres of motorway were (a) in use, (b) under construction and (c) planned but not under construction at 1 November 1983 and 1984.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested is as follows:

Kilometres of motorway as at	1 November 1983	1 November 1984
In use	2,294	2,368
Under construction	124	137
Planned	242	186

Road Accidents (Statistics)

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state, for 1982 and 1983, the costs to the community of road accidents, categorised by (a) lost output, (b) police and administration, (c) medical and ambulance services, (d) damage to property and (e) pain, grief and suffering.

Mrs. Chalker: The estimated costs of road accidents for 1982 and 1983 are:

	1982	1983
(a) Lost output	715	693
(b) Police and administration	124	124
(c) Medical and ambulance services*	73	119
(d) Damage to property	903	906
(e) Pain, grief and suffering	560	535
Total cost	2,375	2,378

* Medical and ambulance costs in the two years have been calculated on a different basis and the two figures are not comparable (the main difference being that the 1983 figure, unlike that for 1982, includes a capital cost element).

M1-M6 (Lighting)

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will list those sections of the M1 motorway up to junction 19 and those sections of the M6 motorway to junction 7 which are presently without lighting, giving the total number of miles of unlit motorway between these points and the total number of miles of motorway between these points which are lit.

Mrs. Chalker: The unlit sections of the M1 motorway up to junction 19 are from Newport Pagnell service area (north of junction 14) to Heyford (junction 16), and Watford Gap (junction 17) to Catthorpe (junction 19). The unlit sections of the M6 motorway up to junction 7 are from Catthorpe (junction 19 on M1) to the eastern side of junction 2 and from the western side of junction 2 to Coleshill (junction 4). The total unlit length of motorway on the M1 up to junction 19 is 22 miles, and the corresponding lit length is 55 miles. The total unlit length of motorway on the M6 up to junction 7 is 21 miles, and the corresponding lit length is 15 miles.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Transport, what regulations he enforces for the transportation of radioactive waste through England by road and rail; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The safety standards for the transport of radioactive materials are based on the International Atomic Energy Agency's Regulations for the Safe Transport of Radioactive Materials 1973 Revised Edition (as amended). These are given effect in the UK by the following:

(i) Road

The Radio-active Substances (Carriage by Road) (Great Britain) Regulations 1974 (SI 1974/1735)

The Radio-active Substances (Road Transport Workers) (Great Britain) Regulations 1970 (SI 1970/1827) and (Amendment) Regulations 1975 (SI 1975/1522)

(ii) Rail

British Railways Board List of Dangerous Goods (LDG) and Conditions of Acceptance by Freight and Passenger Train (1977 Edition as amended)

Bypassed Communities (Service Signs)

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the outcome of the consultation he has recently undertaken with regard to local service signs for bypassed communities.

Mrs. Chalker: Although replies were requested by the end of October, comments are still being received, so it is too early to reach conclusions on the proposals.

Air Treaties (Far East)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in the interest of protecting British Airways against competition on its routes to Australia, it is his intention to seek revision of air treaties with Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia and the Philippines; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have no plans at present to seek any changes in our arrangements with Indonesia, Malaysia and Singapore. We have, however, been unable satisfactorily to resolve a recent dispute with the Philippines and have therefore given 12 months' notice to terminate the air services agreement. During this period I shall be prepared to consider any proposals which will lead to the maintenance of services between Manila and Hong Kong and between Manila and London on a basis which is acceptable to both parties.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Heffer asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the impact on transport fares on Merseyside of Her Majesty's Government's plans to abolish the Merseyside county council.

Mr. David Mitchell: Abolition of the metropolitan counties will not, of itself, affect the level of fares in the metropolitan areas.

Microlight Aircraft

Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has had discussions with the Civil Aviation Authority concerning the mandatory fitting of stroboscopic anti-collision beacons to microlight aircraft; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Discussions have not been held with the Civil Aviation Authority on this issue. Neither we nor the CAA have been approached about the fitting of such lights.

Dim-Dip Regulations

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all the representations received to date in favour of the proposed dim-dip regulations and also all those against.

Mrs. Chalker: The dim-dip regulations were made on 14 December 1983 and came into operation on 13 January 1984.

Since we first consulted on the dim-dip regulations in November 1982 we have received representations from the following:

In support of Dim-Dip

Motorways (Signposts)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will consider the viability of supplementary sign posts on Britain's motorways.

Mrs. Chalker: I am always willing to consider ways of improving our traffic signs but it is vital, in the interests of road safety, that signing on our motorways is kept to the minimum necessary for the safe guidance and efficient management of traffic.

Testing Stations

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will detail the likely effect on the existing Ministry of Transport testing stations, should the proposed Ministry of Transport regulations be introduced.

Mrs. Chalker: I intend to set new conditions for garages entering the MOT testing scheme to improve its operation. I propose that existing testing stations should also meet these conditions, but to give them a liberal period in which to comply.

The main changes that existing stations would be expected to make involve the size and layout of testing bays, which would be used only for MOT or commercial inspection work; minor changes to equipment; the provision of a waiting room overlooking the testing area; and improved arrangements for the safe keeping of test certificates.

Representatives of the motor trade and motoring organisations have been consulted about these proposals but not all have yet submitted their replies. When they have been received, I shall take them into account before reaching a final decision.

WALES

Local Government

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish his reply to the seven-point resolution forwarded to him by the Welsh counties committee and supported by the district councils of Wales calling for an independent commission to report on the constitutional relationship between central and local government, passed by the Welsh local authority associations at the Cardiff meeting on 4 June.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Welsh counties committee was informed that we saw no need to establish such a commission. The constitutional position of local authorities is clear. Their boundaries, powers and functions have been established by Act of Parliament and are subject to change by the will of Parliament.

Anglesey

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state as accurately as possible figues of those in work in Anglesey for each of the last six years; how many are full-time; how many are part-time; how many are female; and how many are self-employed.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information on employees in employment disaggregated to the level requested is not collected annually. The Census of Employment is now carried out triennially and the latest information available is that from the Census of Employment conducted in 1981. The figures for 1981 and 1978 are:

Employees in Employment in Anglesey

	All Employees	Full-time	Part-time	Females
June 1978	16,858	14,006	2,852	6,141
June 1981	16,437	13,070	3,367	6,256

The Census of Population in 1981 gave a figure of 3,693 for the number of self-employed at that time: information in respect of subsequent years is not available.

EC Surplus Foodstuffs

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if, in relation to the storage of surplus EEC foodstuffs in Wales, he will indicate (a) the nature of the commodities involved, (b) the total volume or quantity in each case, (c) the total value according to the latest prices in each case, (d) total floor space occupied in each case, (e) the cost of providing rental and/or rates payable in each case, and (f) the original purchase costs in each case providing the information according to location in Wales; what was the position with regard to each of the above categories of information (i) one year ago and (ii) two years ago; and if he will estimate how each category is expected to change in the next year.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information requested in (a), (b) and (c) is as follow at 30 September 1984:

(a) Commodity	(b) Quantity (Tonnes)	(c) Value £ million
Skimmed Milk Powder	22,263	22·85
Butter	14,772	28·50
Beef	475	1·32

The information requested at (d) is not available, that at (e) is commercially confidential and the information sought at (f), (i) and (ii) could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. It is not possible to give a reasonable estimate of the storage position in Wales over the next year. Stocks will fluctuate as a result of offer levels determined by market forces, sales controlled by Commission decisions, and availability and cost of storage space.

Education Expenditure

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the change in real terms in the total amount of funds he has given or sanctioned to be expended by local education authorities in Wales between 1979-80 and 1984-85.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In cost terms the change between local authorities' actual expenditure in 1979-80 and planned provision for 1984-85 is a decrease of 2 per cent. This figure is calculated using the deflator for gross domestic product at market prices.

School Closures

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many school closures he has approved since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is as follows:

	Numbers
1979	14
1980	15
1981	19
1982	10
1983	28
1984	21
Total	107

Of these some closures were technical closures such as the establishment of a primary school by the amalgamation of an infant and junior school which necessitated the closure of the infant and/or the junior school.

Teachers

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many teachers were employed in (a) the primary and (b) the secondary sector in Wales in 1979-80; how many such posts exist in 1984-85; and what is his estimate of the primary and secondary teaching force in Wales in 1985-86.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The number of teachers employed in 1979-80 is shown in table 10.01 of "Statistics of Education in Wales", No. 8, 1983, a copy of which is in the Library. Information in respect of 1984-85 is not yet available. The Government's expenditure plans, as outlined in Cmnd. 9143, assume that the number of full-time equivalent nursery, primary and secondary teachers will be 26,100 in 1985-86.

Council Houses

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the change in real terms of moneys spent or proposed to be spent on council house buildings, excluding receipts on sales, over the years 1979-80 to 1984-85.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The latest local authority assessment of the 1984-85 capital expenditure on the housing revenue account is £46 million below the 1979-80 level.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many council houses were constructed in 1979-80; how many were constructed in 1983-84; and what is the projected number of council house starts for 1984-85.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Figures for public sector dwellings completed are:

	Local authority	New town
1979-80	3,098	340
1983-84*	1,556	138

* Provisional.

No reliable estimate of housing starts for 1984-85 is available.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the annual amounts realised from council house sales for each year since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The following table gives the net discounted selling price for council dwellings sold in the years 1979-80 to 1984-85.

	£ million
1979-80	8·8
1980-81	12·1
1981-82	85·2
1982-83	111·0
1983-84*	62·1
1984-85†	45·8

* Provisional outturn.
† Local authority forecast.

Local Authority Finance

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the change in real terms of the total moneys allocated to local authorities in Wales over the period 1979-80 to 1983-84; and if he will provide separate figures for district and county authorities.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We assume that the hon. Gentleman is concerned with central Government grants and subsidies to local authorities. These fell by £92 million between 1979-80 and 1983-84 (at 1983-84 prices). A separate comparison for county and district authorities is not possible because of the introduction of block grant in 1981-82.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage change, in cash and real terms is represented by the figures for rate support grant in Wales for 1984-85, projected in July 1984, as compared with the actual figures for 1979-80; and if he will provide separate figures for district and county authorities.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: A separate comparison for district and county authorities is not possible because of the introduction of block grant in 1981-82. The information available is as follows. The 1979-80 figures include second increase order and the 1984-85 figures are as at the first supplementary report.

Rate support grant

	Percentage change 1979-80 to 1984-85
	Cash terms	*Real terms
Domestic element†	−45·2	−64·0
Other elements‡	+44·6	−5·0
Total	+37·5	−9·6

* Deflated to 1984-85 prices using the Gross Domestic Product Deflator.

† Domestic relief is paid to district authorities as a flat rate subsidy (36p in the $ 1979-80, 18½p in the £ 1984-85), to reduce the level of rates paid by the domestic ratepayer.

‡ Prior to 1981-82 the remainder of rate support grant consisted of a needs element and a resources element. From 1979-80, the needs element was distributed separately to districts and counties. Resources element was paid to districts only, but part was appropriated by the county via its precept. For 1984-85 the remainder of rate support grant consists of a separate Block Grant for each authority.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total level of expenditure on the assisted places scheme in Wales from central Government funds in 1982-83 and 1983-84; and what is the estimated level of expenditure for 1984-85.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The expenditure in the financial years 1982-83 and 1983-84 was £275,000 and £455,000 respectively. The estimated cost for 1984-85 is £634,000.

Council Houses (Asbestos)

Mr. John asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest figures for the rate of implementation of the programmes to remove asbestos from council houses in Wales; and if he will make special financial provision from central Government funds to accelerate the programme.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In many cases asbestos is best left alone if it is in a good and solid condition. It is up to each district council to decide on the appropriate action for dealing with asbestos in its housing stock and there is no central programme.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much funding the Welsh Development Agency has received (a) in total and (b) annually since 1979; and what is the change in real terms of the amount of cash given to the Welsh Development Agency between 1979-80 and the stated budgets for 1984-85.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Welsh Development Agency has received a total of £287·3 million in Government funds over the period 1979-80 to 1983-84 inclusive, made up as follows:

	£million
1979-80	47·6
1980-81	64·6
1981-82	76·0
1982-83	56·7
1983-84	42·4

Adjusting for general inflation as measured by the 1982-83 GDP deflator, the agency's Supply Estimates provision for 1984-85 amounts to £42·5 million compared with a similarly adjusted figure for 1979-80 of £66·2 million. The reduction in resources over the last few years essentially reflects the completion of the agency's major capital programmes in the steel closure areas.

SCOTLAND

National Health Service

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were employed in the National Health Service in Scotland at the latest date; what were the figures in June 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: At 30 September 1983, there were in whole-time equivalent terms 124,491 staff employed in the National Health Service in Scotland. The equivalent figure as at 30 September 1979 (June figures are not available) was 115,984. These statistics show that the number of staff in the Scottish Health Service has increased by 7·3 per cent. since this Government came to office.

Doctors

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many doctors were employed in the National Health Service in Scotland at the latest date; what were the figures in June 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: At 30 September 1983, there were in whole-time equivalent terms 9,038 doctors, including general medical practitioners, engaged in the National Health Service in Scotland. The equivalent figure as at 30 September 1979 (June figures are not available) was 8,616. These statistics show that the number of doctors in the Scottish Health Service has increased by around 5 per cent. since this Government came to office.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many doctors were unemployed in Scotland at the latest available date; and what were the comparable figures for June 1979.

Mr. John MacKay: At 30 September 1982, the number of registered unemployed in Scotland claiming medical qualifications (who would not necessarily all be seeking employment as doctors) was 106. The comparable figure for June 1979 was 35. Since analysis of the registered unemployed by occupation has been discontinued, information beyond 1982 from this source is not available to my Department. Information from other sources suggests that any unemployment experienced by doctors is of short duration and occurs mainly when moving from one stage of specialised training to another, but my Department is keeping a close watch on the position.

Scottish Development Agency

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much funding the Scottish Development Agency has received (a) in total and (b) annually since 1979; and what has been the change in real terms in the amount of money they are expected to receive in 1984-85 and the amount they received in 1979-80.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Since 1979 the Scottish Development Agency has received Government funding as follows:

1979-80	64·9
1980-81	79·9
1981-82	76·4
1982-83	101·5
1983-84	89·7
*1984-84	99·4
Total	511·8

* Supply estimate.

Adjusting for general inflation as measured by the GDP deflator at 1982-83 market prices, the agency's supply estimate provision for 1984-85 amounts to £90·7 million as compared with the similarly adjusted 1979-80 figure of £90·2 million.

Mr. George Beattie

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will reply to the letter of 2 May about the conviction of George Beattie, from the right hon. Member for Clydesdale.

Mr. Younger: I have discussed the matters raised in that letter with the right hon. Member and I shall write as soon as I have completed my inquiries into the various points which she has raised about this case.

Private Residential Homes

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what steps he is taking to cater for the needs of old people living in private residential homes which are forced to close; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what plans he has to seek powers to control the number of private residential homes and the charges they impose for their services; and if he will make a statement;

(3) how many private residential homes have been closed down by local social services departments in Scotland during each of the past four years and in the first half of 1984; what reasons were given for these closures; and if he will make a statement;

(4) how many complaints he has investigated concerning old people being ill-treated or defrauded in private residential homes in Scotland since June 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Residents admitted privately would have to make their own arrangements in the event of closure but assistance might be sought from the regional or islands councils' social work department. I would expect the social work department to take a close interest in alternative arrangements for sponsored residents.

Responsibility for registering private residential homes lies with the social work department; charges are a matter for the proprietor and the resident or his representative. My right hon. Friend has no plans to change those arrangements.

Social work departments are not required to inform my Department if registrations are cancelled and information about closures is not held centrally.

Allegations of ill-treatment or fraud would be for consideration by the social work department responsible for registering the home or for the police; no such complaints have been made to my right hon. Friend.

Education Expenditure

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the expenditure on education per pupil in each education authority in Scotland in the latest year; and what was the average figure for Scotland overall.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The latest available information is shown in the following table:

Regional/Islands council	£
Borders	1,007
Central	1,018
Dumfries and Galloway	994

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the expenditure on primary education per pupil in each education authority in Scotland in the latest available year; what is the Scottish average; and what were the corresponding figures for the two previous years.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is shown in the following table:

Net expenditure per pupil in primary schools (at out-turn prices)

Scotland	638	750	821

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the amount spent on private education from Government sources in Scotland in the past three years; and if he will itemise the sources.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I list as follows assistance provided by my Department for school pupils educated in the private sector.

	Fiscal years
	1981-82 £000	1982-83 £000	1983-84 £000

Assisted places grants	512	1,393	2,225
Aided places grants (St. Mary's music school)	—	—	58

* Maintenance Grant to St. Mary's music school ceased in 1983.

Cash Limits

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what changes will be made to cash limits in 1984-85 which are within his responsibility.

Mr. Younger: The information is as follows:

Class XV, vote 3: regional and general industrial support, Scotland

Subject to parliamentary approval of the supplementary estimate the cash limit will be reduced by £2,338,000 to offset an increase on class XV, vote 5: selective assistance and compensation, Scotland.

Class XV, vote 6: roads, transport and environmental services, Scotland

Subject to parliamentary approval of the supplementary estimate the cash limit will be reduced by £65,000 to reflect the actual take up of increased provision allowed under the end-year flexibility scheme announced on 31 July 1984 at column 190.

The new cash limits are summarised as follows:

	Present Cash Limit £	New Cash Limit £
Class XV
Vote 3	139,489,000	137,151,000
Vote 6	149,896,000	149,831,000

These changes will not add to total planned public expenditure.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Tristan da Cunha

90. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has investigated the case for the generation of electricity by wind power on Tristan da Cunha; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Responsibility for the provision of electricity on Tristan da Cunha lies with the Island Council.

Mr. Varktes and Mrs. Lilian Arakelians

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is now able to convey his decision in respect of the application for a United Kingdom visa by a Mr. Varktes and Mrs. Lilian Arakelians, c/o 337 Ferdowsi Avenue, Tehran, following their interview at the British Interest Section of the Swedish embassy in Tehran on Tuesday 30 October.

Mr. Renton: No, Mr. and Mrs. Arakelian visited the British Interests Section on 30 October 1984 and were given an appointment for a visa interview for 12 November. After the entry clearance officer has interviewed the applicants he will make a decision on the applications or refer them for further advice as appropriate.

Council of Europe (Refugees and Overpopulation)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Government will now take up full membership of the Council of Europe fund for national refugees and overpopulation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The United Kingdom is not a member of the fund. We have no plans to join it.

Disarmament Convention (Perugia)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the third European nuclear disarmament convention held in Perugia in July 1984.

Mr. Luce: This convention was, like its predecessors, critical of both NATO and the Warsaw Pact. Delegations from the official "peace committees" of several Warsaw pact countries were present for the first time, but a large number of representatives from unofficial peace and human rights groups in Eastern Europe were denied exit visas and were unable therefore to attend. Copies of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's background brief, the "Third European Nuclear Disarmament Convention, Perugia, July 1984", produced in September 1984, are available in the Library.

Foreign Compensation (Czechoslovakia)

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many claims have been lodged under the terms of the Foreign Compensation (Czechoslovakia) Order 1982; and how many have so far been dealt with by the Foreign Compensation Commission, indicating what proportions have been accepted and rejected.

Mr. Renton: A total of 2,184 claims have been lodged with the Foreign Compensation Commission. The commission has so far dealt with 236 of these claims. Eighty-one claims for awards of compensation have been accepted and provisionally assessed. Seventy-five claims have been dismissed either summarily or provisionally. In 80 cases the claimants have withdrawn their claims.

Helsinki Final Act

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about Her Majesty's Government's policy concerning any steps taken in the past six months by the Soviet Union towards the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act.

Mr. Rifkind: It is our policy to report to the House at six-monthly intervals on the implementation by the Soviet Union and other countries in eastern Europe of the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. I last did so in the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) on 17 July at column 91. A further report will be submitted to the House early next year. Meanwhile, I regret to say that there have been no signs of improvement in the compliance by the Soviet Union with the provisions of the Final Act, especially in the human rights area.

Gibraltar

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the new agreement between Spain and the United Kingdom will give to any category of Spanish national right of access and ownership of property in Gibraltar which will not be available to Spanish nationals in other parts of the European Economic Community when Spain accedes to the treaty of Rome.

Mr. Renton: No new agreement has been concluded between Spain and the United Kingdom. On Spain's accession to the EC, Spanish nationals will be entitled to enjoy throughout the Community—including Gibraltar—those rights provided for by the treaty of Rome, subject to any derogations and transitional periods that may be agreed between the Community and Spain.

Nicaragua

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the nature and numbers of British diplomatic representation in Nicaragua.

Mr. Renton: The following diplomatic staff are accredited to Nicaragua:—An ambassador and consul-general who resides at San José, a chargé d'affaires, who resides in Managua. In addition, a first secretary and third secretary resident in San José are accredited to Nicaragua and a defence attaché and assistant defence attaché who reside in Mexico.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received and what conclusions he has reached concerning the nature and conduct of the recent elections in Nicaragua; and if representatives of Her Majesty's Government were offered any facilities for observation.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend indicated to the House on 9 November the conclusion we reached concerning the recent elections in Nicaragua. We declined an invitation by the Supreme Electoral Commission of Nicaragua to send official observers. Her Majesty's ambassador during the normal exercise of his duties followed the election process and was afforded normal facilities.

United Nations Law of the Sea

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make a statement on the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the United Nations law of the sea outlining those sections with which Her Majesty's Government (a) agree and (b) disagree, and the reasons for their assessment;

(2) if it is Her Majesty's Government's intention to sign and ratify the United Nations law of the sea convention.

Mr. Renton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. and learned Friend on 9 November to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) at column 41.

Immigration

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, during his forthcoming visit to the Indian sub-continent, he will be discussing the introduction of tape recording facilities for interviews carried out by entry clearance officers and immigration officers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has no present plans to visit the Indian sub-continent.

I hope to visit Pakistan and Bangladesh early in the new year and will then give further consideration to the possibility of the tape recording of entry clearance interviews.

World Festivals of Youth and Students

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why he sent the note issued in August by the cultural relations department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to the British Youth Council, regarding the World Festivals of Youth and Students.

Mr. Renton: The letter that accompanied the note to which the hon. Member refers set out our reasons. The main consideration was that the British Youth Council's membership should know the background to the World Festivals of Youth and Students, which have a long history as international Communist propaganda events.

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what restrictions are placed by the United Kingdom on (a) the movements and (b) the normal privileges of foreign diplomats entitled to diplomatic immunity in Britain; and if he will give the foreign state concerned in each case.

Mr. Rifkind: Diplomats of the Soviet Union — except the head of mission — Vietnam, Mongolia and China are required to obtain permission and to give at least two working days' notice before travelling more than 35 miles—25 miles for Soviet diplomats—from Hyde park corner.

Limits are imposed, on a non-discriminatory basis, on the number of cars and the quantity of spirits and cigarettes which a diplomat may acquire duty-free.

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will provide a breakdown of the figures given to the Foreign Affairs Committee on 20 June concerning offences alleged to have been committed by foreign diplomats in the United Kingdom over the last 10 years so as to show to which foreign state or group of state each belongs.

Mr. Rifkind: No. It would be inappropriate to list the nationality of the alleged offenders since their guilt has not been established in court. Nor do I consider that it would be appropriate to indicate the regional group to which the alleged offenders belong.

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress made so far in formulating proposals for the reform of the law covering diplomatic immunity.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. and learned Friend intends to make a statement to the House on this subject in due course.

Diplomatic Bags

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to what extent diplomatic bags on entry to the United Kingdom are subjected to scrutiny with the consent of the foreign state concerned.

Mr. Rifkind: Scrutiny of incoming foreign diplomatic bags is confined to checking that they bear visible external marks of their character, in accordance with article 27.4 of the Vienna convention on diplomatic relations. We do not scan or X-ray incoming bags. The implications of changing this practice, which accords with that followed by virtually all other states, remain under review.

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the diplomatic representatives of the United Kingdom overseas are permitted to give consent to scrutiny of their diplomatic bags if requested.

Mr. Rifkind: We would not permit such scrutiny to go beyond checking that the bags bear visible external marks of their character, in accordance with article 27.4 of the Vienna convention on diplomatic relations. We do not scan or X-ray incoming bags. The implications of changing this practice, which accords with that followed by virtually all other states, remain under review.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the London Docklands Development Corporation will take steps to ensure that the Daily Telegraph uses water transport for the delivery of paper when it moves into its new site on the Isle of Dogs.

Sir George Young: The possibility of using water transport is being discussed by the Daily Telegraph and LDDC, but ultimately the method by which paper is delivered is a commercial matter for the Daily Telegraph to decide.

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much has been spent on infrastructure on each site that the London Docklands Development Corporation has acquired in the enterprise zone, site by site, on the Isle of Dogs.

Sir George Young: The cost of infrastructure works carried out by LDDC within the enterprise zone, primarily on new roads, drainage and main services, cannot be broken down among individual sites.

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what price the London Docklands Development Corporation paid per acre for each site that it has acquired in the enterprise zone in the Isle of Dogs.

Sir George Young: Final settlement of terms for the bulk of the land acquired by LDDC in the enterprise zone is still the subject of negotiation and, in one case, a reference to the Lands Tribunal. To provide further information would prejudice these and future negotiations.

Rate Support Grant (Computer Time)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the estimated cost to his Department of computer time devoted to rate support grant, including targets and penalties, and rate limitation in each year from 1981-82 to 1985-86, most recent estimate; and what proportion was undertaken outside the United Kingdom.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The estimated cost to this Department of computer time devoted to Rate Support Grant in each of the years 1981-82 and 1985-86 is as follows:

Annual Expenditure including VAT

1981-82	606,400
1982-83	615,200
1983-84	606,600
1984-85*	495,000
1985-86†	576,000

* Estimated outturn.
† Projected.

All this expenditure is now incurred with computer bureaux based in the United Kingdom.

Local Authorities (Expenditure Targets)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the percentage of total national expenditure targets made up by the targets of (a) inner London boroughs, (b) outer London boroughs, (c) London precepting authorities, (d) metropolitan districts, (e) metropolitan counties, (f) non-metropolitan districts and (g) non-metropolitan counties in each year from 1981-82 to 1984-85.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The information is as follows:

Targets (per cent.)

	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
Inner London boroughs	3·55	4·60	4·54	4·58

London precepting authorities*	6·43	6·19	6·71	6·74
Metropolitan districts	19·74	20·85	20·50	20·41
Metropolitan counties	6·60	5·42	5·58	5·55
Non-metropolitan districts	6·52	7·45	7·30	7·31
Non-metropolitan counties	48·53	46·60	46·68	46·76

* Excluding the Metropolitan police.

Block Grant

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total claims on block grant at original budget stage in each year from 1981-82 to 1984-85, showing for each year the percentage overclaim or underclaim.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The information is as follows:

1981-82	8,653·5	+3·6
1982-83	8,756·0	+0·9
1983-84	8,665·0	−0·7
1984-85	8,560·2	−0·6

* over (+) or under (−) claim.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the block grant paid in each year from 1981-82 to 1984-85 to each of the 18 authorities designated under the Rates Act 1984.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The information is given in the table. The figures are the amount of block grant paid to the authorities in respect of the years shown. All figures are latest entitlements, after holdback. Those for 1981-82 are final entitlements; those for 1982-83 are based on outturn expenditure information; those for 1983-84 and 1984-85 are based on budgets.

The figures for London Boroughs for 1981-82 include grant paid in respect of the Greater London council and the Metropolitan police; and those for 1982-83 include the Metropolitan police.

Urban Development Grants

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many projects to date are covered by urban development grants; how much public expenditure is involved in the current financial year; and how much is committed thereby in future years.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: My Department has so far given final approval to 102 projects for urban development grant. A further 30 projects have received offers of grant to which responses from local authorities remain outstanding. The estimated total costs of these 132 projects are more than £347 million. Of this some £280 million would be invested by the private sector and £67 million would be met by the urban development grant and other public funds, spread over several years.

These figures do not include offers of urban development grant which have not been taken up.

Archaeological Heritage (European Convention)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration the Government are giving to the draft European convention on the archaeological heritage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: The European convention on the protection of the archaeological heritage was ratified by the United Kingdom on 8 December 1972 and came into effect on 9 March 1973.

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration the Government are giving to the draft European convention on the underwater archaeological heritage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I have been asked to reply.

We are consulting interested groups in this country following the last meeting in March of the Council of Europe committee which is drafting this convention. The committee's mandate has been extended until 31 December 1985.

Inner City Areas (Special Aid Programme)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give an up-to-date breakdown of the organisations and projects which have benefited from the Government's special aid programme for inner city areas, since 1981.

Sir George Young: Of the 21,000 projects worth some £830 million supported under the urban programme since 1981, 66 per cent. were run by local authorities, 30 per cent. by voluntary organisations, and 4 per cent. by private organisations. By project type, 35 per cent. of the total number of projects were economic, 17 per cent. environmental and 48 per cent. social.

Inner Urban Areas

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will extend to designated authorities under the Inner Urban Areas Act 1978 allocations for social schemes on the same basis as applies to partnership and programme authorities.

Sir George Young: No. It is the Government's policy to concentrate urban programme resources in the partnership and programme authority areas, as they have the greatest needs. Other designated districts do, however, have access to limited funding under the traditional urban programme to support social projects.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will extend to all authorities designated under the Inner Urban Areas Act 1978 disregard for all expenditure arising from the urban area scheme.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend will consider the representations he has received to that effect before final decisions are made on grant abatement for any year.

Urban Programme

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what resources he is proposing to make available to the designated districts under the urban programme in 1984-85.

Sir George Young: Designated districts which are not partnership or programme authorities have been allocated £8 million for industrial and commercial projects in 1984-85. They will also receive about £10 million under the traditional urban programme.

Council Properties (Sales)

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, of the 600,000 dwellings sold by local authorities and new towns in England from April 1979 to June 1984, how many were flats.

Sir George Young: About 23,000 of these dwellings were flats.

Rate Support Grants

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what change he proposes to make in the cash limit for rate support grants, England, class XVIII, vote 1.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class XVIII, vote 1 will be increased by £21,000,000 from £8,848,000,000 to £8,869,000,000. Provision on this vote is not classified as public expenditure. This increase is required in order to reflect fully:

(a) the abatement of block grant in respect of 1984-85 by £452,000,000 authorised by the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) 1984-85 (approved by by the House on 18 July 1984);

(b) the increase by £45,000,000 in block grant payable in respect of 1982-83 authorised by the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 2) 1982-83 (approved by by the House on 18 July 1984);
(c) the recovery of £44,000,000 block grant in respect of 1983-84 authorised by the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 2) 1983-84 (approved by the House on 20 March 1984).

It also takes account of a further abatement of grant entitlement for 1984-85 of an estimated £3,000,000, in the light of an adjustment to the total budgeted expenditure figures received from local authorities. This is subject to the approval of another rate support grant supplementary report for 1984-85, which my right hon. Friend hopes to lay before the House in December.

The cash limit reduction which my right hon. Friend announced on 14 June 1984 anticipated an overall reduction in grant payable in 1984-85 of £475,000,000 from £9,323,000,000 to £8,848,000,000.

Housing Starts

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of public sector housing starts in each year from 1978 onwards and the estimated total starts for 1984; and what has been the reduction in percentage terms between the number of such starts in 1978 and in 1983.

Sir George Young: The figures for England from 1978, including provisional statistics for January to September 1984, appear in table 2 of the Department's monthly housing statistics press notice (No. 484) published on 1 November: a copy is in the library.

Public sector housing starts were 56 per cent. lower in 1983 than in 1978.

The Department has made no estimates for the whole of 1984.

Public Sector Housing

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in the last two years from local authorities, housing associations, and voluntary organisations expressing concern over the housing shortage and urging the need for a greater supply of public sector housing; and if he will name the organisations and place a copy of their letters in the Library.

Sir George Young: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

United Nations Environment Programme

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what participation his Department will have, in the coming year, in the United Nations environment programme.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The United Kingdom hopes to be re-elected during the current General Assembly to the governing council of the United Nations environment programme (UNEP). My Department is responsible for co-ordinating the Government's participation in the work of UNEP and will lead the delegation to the Governing Council in May 1985. We will also continue to give our support to individual activities within the programme.

Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's current involvement with the United Nations environment programme human settlements (habitat) project.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The Department was represented at the last meeting of the United Nations commission on human settlements (habitat) in May of this year by an official observer. It is anticipated that an observer will attend the next meeting of the commission next May.

Housing Defects Act 1984

Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when further information is to be published on the scheme of assistance for private owners of prefabricated reinforced concrete houses under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those orders which have been made under the Housing Defects Act 1984 and those orders which he intends to make in the next six months.

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment, for Scotland and for Wales have made the Housing Defects Act 1984 (Commencement) Order 1984 which brings the Act, with the exception of section 28, into effect in Great Britain on 1 December 1984.

My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Wales, by virtue of the Housing Defects (Prefabricated Reinforced Concrete Dwellings) (England and Wales) Designations 1984, made on 1 November 1984, have designated for the purposes of the scheme of assistance the following classes of building, as defined in the Designations:

Airey
Boot
Cornish Unit
Dorran
Dyke
Gregory
Myton
Newland
Orlit
Parkinson
Reema Hollow Panel
Schindler and Hawksley SGS
Stent
Stonecrete
Tarran
Underdown
Unity and Butterley
Waller
Wates
Wessex
Winget
Woolaway

The Hamish Cross and Stour types of dwelling are to be designated shortly.

My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment, Scotland and Wales have laid before the House an order under paragraph 2 of schedule 1 to the Act setting an expenditure limit, for the purpose of calculating the amount of reinstatement grant payable in each case, of £14,000 for all types of defective dwelling under the Act.

Owners of dwellings which are defective dwellings for the purposes of the Act will, from 1 December, be able to apply to their local housing authority for assistance under the Act. Owners will have 10 years from 1 December 1984 within which to apply for assistance. The Designations provide that the "cut off date" (ie, the date by which an owner must normally have bought his dwelling in order to be eligible for assistance under the Act) is to be 26 April 1984 for all types of prefabricated reinforced concrete house, except the Airey type, for which the "cut off date" is to be 8 September 1982.

A circular is being sent today to all local housing authorities in England and Wales about the Act and the scheme of assistance for owners of prefabricated reinforced concrete houses. I understand that a circular will be issued to local housing authorities in Scotland shortly.

The Department's discussions with the Building Societies Association and National House-Building Council about arrangements intended to enable building societies to lend with confidence on the security of repaired prefabricated reinforced concrete houses are continuing as a matter of urgency and I hope to be able to make a further announcement about them shortly.

Lee Valley Park

Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements will be made for the financing and membership of the Lee Valley regional park authority in the event of the Greater London council being abolished.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: After considering responses to the consultation paper on future arrangements for the Lee Valley regional park, I have decided that in the event of the GLC abolition, Greater London's share of the costs of the park should be split between the 32 boroughs and the City of London by way of a per capita levy, with the six riparian London boroughs (Enfield, Hackney, Haringey, Newham, Tower Hamlets and Waltham Forest), which already appoint one member each to the authority, making a double per capita contribution. I have also decided that the eight members of the authority at present appointed by the GLC should be replaced by eight members appointed by the 26 non-riparian boroughs and the City acting jointly. These changes to the Lee Valley Regional Park Act 1966 would be contained in an order laid before Parliament under powers to be included in the Local Government Bill to be introduced shortly.

I am concerned that the present statutory arrangements for the park, under which Greater London contributes 80 per cent. of the precept, even though only 36 per cent. of the park's area lies within the Greater London boundary, may not reflect a proper balance. Although fundamental changes would not be appropriate in the context of GLC abolition, I intend in due course to invite the various bodies concerned to consider whether legislation to change those arrangements should be promoted.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Subsidies and Purchases

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will list the individuals and companies in the United Kingdom which have obtained a subsidy for crushing oilseed rape;

(2) whether he will give a list of the individuals and companies in the United Kingdom which have purchased butter from intervention;

(3) whether he will give a list of the individuals and companies in the United Kingdom which have purchased butter oil from intervention.

Mr. Jopling: No. It would be a breach of confidence to provide information on transactions between individuals or companies and the Intervention Board.

Straw Burning

Mr. Freeman asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps the Government propose to take to amend the present model byelaws governing straw and stubble burning so as to include oil seed rape.

Mr. Jopling: My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and I propose shortly to consult the local authority associations and other interested organisations on a separate scheme of model byelaws to regulate the burning of residues of oil seed rape and certain other crops. It is our intention that these byelaws should be available to local authorities in time for next year's burning season.

Hens' Eggs

Mr. Waller asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if it is his policy that the proposed amended regulations relating to the labelling of hens' eggs should require the declaration of methods of production.

Mr. MacGregor: Council Regulation (EEC) No. 1831/84 of 19 June 1984 provides for the optional declaration of method of production on retail packs. But such declarations may only make use of terms that have yet to be set out in a Commission regulation. My Department, in close consultation with the interests concerned, is seeking to play a constructive role in the discussions on the Commission regulation.

Milk (Direct Sales)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what volume of direct sales quota has been applied for in the United Kingdom; and how the total volume of valid claims compares with the official statistics for direct sales in the year from April 1983 to 31 March 1984 and in the calendar year 1981.

Mr. MacGregor: I regret that the volume of direct sales quota applied for in the United Kingdom is not yet available. A final figure will not be known until all applications for primary and for secondary quota have been considered, and the dairy produce quota tribunals has heard all appeals against awards of secondary quota made by local panels.

Statistics show that levels of recorded direct sales in the years in question were:

1981 calendar year 326·3 million litres
1983-84 marketing year 338·78 million litres

This reflects direct sales of producer processors, producer retailers farmhouse cheesemakers; farmhouse butter, certain cheeses, and cream are not reported.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to check the authenticity of claims for direct sales quotas.

Mr. MacGregor: All producers who declared that they were engaged in direct sales on 2 April this year will, prima facie, be eligible for registration and entitled to quota allocations. The dairy produce quotas regulations provide heavy penalties for making false or reckless statements to secure an allocation of quota, and Ministers may, following conviction for such offences, in addition, reduce quotas.

As part of normal administrative procedures, officials of my Department will be checking any inconsistencies found between details given in direct sellers' applications and existing information normally available to the Department.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how the total volume of valid direct sales claims compares with the national direct sales quota.

Mr. MacGregor: I regret that it is not yet possible to assess the final figure of direct sales primary and secondary quota against the United Kingdom total quota allocation of 386·5 million litres, or 398,000 tonnes. The applications are still being processed.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the size of the national direct sales reserve; and what proportion of this volume arises from the surrender of direct sales quota by producers who have ceased direct selling.

Mr. MacGregor: The dairy produce quotas regulations 1984 provide that a direct sales reserve may be created from any quota not allocated to producers, and by such quota as may be given up by direct sellers.

Until all special case claims have been settled it is not possible to give direct sellers their final quota allocations and determine whether there is any unallocated quota to be placed in the reserve. Firm undertakings are now being received from producers who have applied and have been invited to give up direct sales quota under the outgoers' scheme which will provide the second element in the creation of a reserve.

Wholesale Milk Deliveries

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, what was the average percentage trend in wholesale milk deliveries between in determining the regional or provisional regional wholesale quotas published in the London Gazette on 25 July.

Mr. MacGregor: I regret that there is a typographical error in the Order Paper which means that I am unable to understand the question. I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible after it is corrected.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average percentage trend in wholesale milk deliveries between 1981 and 1983 in the United Kingdom; and what was the percentage trend in wholesale deliveries between 1981 and 1983 in each of the nine regions of the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: Between 1981 and 1983, wholesale milk deliveries in the United Kingdom increased by 9·14 per cent. For the same period the increase in England and Wales was 7·9 per cent. In Scotland, the increase was 11·63 per cent. In Northern Ireland the increase was 19·53 per cent. Detailed figures are not immediately available for the other regions and I hope to provide them shortly.

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on what mathematical basis the trends in wholesale milk deliveries were taken into account in determining the percentage reductions on 1983 wholesale deliveries in each of the nine regions of the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the evidence of my right hon. Friend to the House Agriculture Committee on 4 July 1984.

Milk (Volume)

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportions of the volumes claimed relate to direct usage for pasteurised milk, untreated milk and for milk products.

Mr. MacGregor: The applications for direct sales quota are still being processed. While it is too early to give information requested, direct sellers have only been asked to provide details of liquid whole milk, skimmed milk, and semi-skimmed milk as well as of butter, cream or cheese sales in their base years.

Dairy Farms (Milk Quotas)

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the minimum period for which part or the whole of a dairy farm, with its appropriate proportion of the farm's milk quota, can be leased or rented to a third party, and then, at the termination of that lease, recovered by the lessor or landlord with its milk quota still intact.

Mr. MacGregor: The dairy produce quotas regulations (DI 1984/1047) specify no minimum period for a lease of the whole or part of a dairy holding with quota. However no quota is tranferred when a "minor change of occupation" takes place. A "minor change of occupation" is defined in the regulations as:

(a) the area occupation of which changes is less than—

(i) in respect of a holding in Northern Ireland, three quarters of the area of the holding as previously constituted (and also no larger than 40 hectares), and

(ii) in respect of a holding elsewhere, one quarter of the area of the remainder of the holding (and also no larger than 5 hectares), and

(b) the interest of the occupier who moves into that part of that holding is a tenancy or less than a tenancy and has a duration of less than one year—"

Poultry (Hygiene)

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, in discussions in the Council of Ministers on regulations governing the hygiene of poultry and the fees payable therefor, he will seek to harmonise standards before harmonising fees.

Mrs. Fenner: I agree with the objective stated by the hon. Member. However, if this is not immediately attainable, we are prepared to consider proposals on charging if these will help to remove distortions in competition between the poultrymeat industries of the Community.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the bodies by which objections have been made to the Government's interpretation of the regulations governing poultrymeat hygiene; and if he will list the substance of such objections.

Mrs. Fenner: Since the Poulty Meat (Hygiene) Regulations were made in 1976 the Government have discussed the interpretation of a number of aspects of the regulations with interested bodies, especially the British Poultry Federation. A complete list of issues covered is not readily available.

Milk Quotas

Mr. Nicholson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the amount of milk quota already purchased by Government from the buy-out scheme in each of the areas of the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: No milk quota has yet been purchased. The closing date for the return of the claim forms from the first tranche of producers who have been offered the chance to participate in the outgoers' scheme has only just passed.

Expenditure

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement concerning planned expenditure for agriculture, fisheries and food, in 1985 to 1986.

Mr. Jopling: As announced in the Chancellor's statement today, planned expenditure on agriculture, fisheries and food in 1985-86 will be £2249 million. This represents a net increase in support for the industries of £103 million over what was previously planned. Within this total, provision is made for additional expenditure of £189 million by the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce, mainly to finance the expected increase in intervention for cereals, partly offset by reduced expenditure of £58 million by the three Agriculture Departments on schemes pre-funded by the Community. The net increase in expenditure funded by the European Community amounts to £131 million.

The other expenditure in 1985-86 for which my agriculture colleagues and I are responsible, shows a net reduction of £36 million —4.2 per cent. of domestic expenditure and 1.7 per cent. of total expenditure on agriculture fisheries and food. Our main concern had been, taking account of changing circumstances and developments in the European Community, to ensure that the resources available for these programmes within total planned public expenditure are deployed in ways which will best serve the changing needs of the industry. In this connection, the future role of ADAS has recently been reviewed by the Director General and his report will be published tomorrow.

We shall be reducing expenditure under the capital grants schemes by about £40 million in 1985-86. The details will be given in orders which I shall shortly lay before Parliament. The changes in the schemes are designed to pave the way for the new measures which we expect to introduce in 1985 to implement a new EC structures regulation. They will take account of particular needs in the livestock sector and will further advance my intention to secure a better balance in these policies between agriculture and conservation. We shall also be making a reduction of £12 million in assistance for arterial drainage and flood protection. We intend to provide continued support for hill farming through livestock compensatory allowances extended to the newly designated areas and I shall be announcing the 1985 rates shortly. There will also be provision for the continuation of the enhanced rate of suckler cow subsidy I announced last April and for payments to producers under the milk outgoers's scheme, amounting together to some £20 million. The net outcome for domestic expenditure I refer to above takes account of these commitments and further adjustments.

Outgoers' Scheme

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give details of the £50 million expenditure to be made available for the milk supplementary levy (outgoers) scheme which he announced on 25 May; what adjustments are being made to cash limits to accommodate this expenditure; and whether any other change in cash limits is being proposed for the departmental votes for which he has responsibility.

Mr. Jopling: Payments under the milk supplementary levy (outgoers) scheme to producers discontinuing milk production for sale will be made in five equal annual instalments. Annual expenditure of £10 million will be distributed as follows:

£6,249,000 to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to meet expenditure arising in England;

£775,000 to the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland;

£1,260,000 to the Welsh Office;

£1,716,000 to the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland.

Parliamentary approval for the first year's payments in England, Wales and Scotland will be sought in the winter Supplementary Estimates. For Northern Ireland, parliamentary approval will be sought in their autumn Supplementary Estimates. It is proposed to bring a Bill before the House shortly to give statutory effect to the scheme.

In addition to these changes, a winter Supplementary Estimate will also be presented for additional administrative expenditure by the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce on class III vote 2. This will seek provision to cover the additional work load arising from this year's CAP price fixing settlement, the record cereals harvest and the need for inspection facilities under the beef premium scheme. The increase will be offset by a transfer from class III, vote 4.

The consequent changes to cash limits are as follows:

Class	Vote	Department	Original cash limit	Increase due to outgoers scheme	Other changes	Revised cash limit
III	2	IBAP	19,481	—	*600	20,141
III	4	MAFF	143,545	6,249	*−660	149,134
XV	2	DAFS	61,235	775	†−2	62,008
XVI	5	WO	48,979	1,260	‡−2,482	47,757
NID1		Northern Ireland Departments	‖2,059·5	‖1·7	‖¶1·3	‖2,062·5

*Offsetting changes, as described above.

†Savings made following the abolition of National Insurance Surcharge.

‡The reduction results from savings on the Welsh Development Agency's grant in aid (−£2,500,000) required to offset additional expenditure on Selective Financial Assistance in class XVI, vote 3. It also incorporates the cost of dairy produce quota local panels (+£125,000), the surrender of excess appropriations in aid (−£90,000) and savings made following the abolition of national insurance surcharge (−£17,000).

‖Figures for Northern Ireland are rounded to the nearest £0·1 million.

¶Details of the funding of part of the increased cost to the NHS of recent pay awards are given by the Chief Secretary in a written answer of today's date.

Cash limit increases not offset by reductions are being charged to the Reserve.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Company Directors (National Insurance)

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has completed his examination of personal liability of directors for national insurance contribution debts for their companies.

Mr. Fowler: I have examined carefully the special power contained in section 152(4) of the Social Security Act 1975, under which directors can become personally liable for the national insurance contribution debts of their company if they knew or should have known that the contributions were not being paid.

This power is not conferred on other revenue-collecting Departments. It has been criticised on the grounds that its use can result in exceptionally harsh personal financial penalties in certain circumstances; and that it may be a disincentive to directors to strive to save their companies, or may discourage the appointment of new directors where this might be in the interests of a company in difficulties.

I have decided that the use of section 152(4) is no longer justified and I intend to repeal it as soon as a suitable opportunity arises. This will bring my Department's powers into line with those of other revenue-collecting Departments, and it is my intention to keep in step with them in future.

From the date of this announcement, I propose to take no further action in any case in which my Department is currently involved.

Blind Persons

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many registered blind people there were in the United Kingdom in 1983.

Mr. Newton: As at 31 March 1982, the latest date for which information is centrally available for the United Kingdom as a whole, the total number of registered blind people was as follows:—

	Number
England	111,729
Wales	7,861
Scotland	11,259
United Kingdom	130,849

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of blind people who will receive less than they otherwise would have done in the November uprating of benefits because of the increase in the available scale margin; and if he will estimate the total saving to the Exchequer resulting from this.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many blind people will become subject to the £1 available scale margin reduction from their additional allowances under the supplementary benefit regulations on 26 November; what savings will result; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The available scale margin does not apply to the blindness addition or the age addition, nor does it affect those blind people who are in receipt of the short-term rate of supplementary benefit including those claiming as unemployed. For blind people on the long-term scale rate, the effect will vary according to the nature and extent of any payment they receive for additional requirements. I will write to the hon. Members with further information as soon as possible.

"Fares to Hospital"

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps are being taken to distribute the leaflet, "Fares to Hospital", in rural areas.

Mr. Whitney: The leaflet "Fares to Hospital" is widely distributed to health authorities and family practitioner committees for issue to hospitals and general practitioners' surgeries in both rural and urban areas. It is also available in local DHSS offices and in many citizens' advice bureaux.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will now extend the long-term rate of supplementary benefit to the unemployed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The necessary resources of about £500 million are not available to implement this proposal, which in any case raises wider questions about the supplementary benefit scheme more properly considered in the current social security review.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what change is to be made after the uprating on 26 November in the amount that is deemed to be paid by a trade union to its members on strike in the course of a dispute, which is then deducted from any supplementary benefit paid to such families.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the proposals for increased surveillance and fraud investigation of supplementary benefit claimants who use postal applications to claim benefit.

Mr. Newton: We have no such proposals at present.

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to receive the report of the Social Security Advisory Committee on the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulations 1984, regarding single payments for furniture; and when it will be published.

Mr. Whitney: I understand that the Social Security Advisory Committee expects to finalise its report to my right hon. Friend on the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulations 1984 regarding single payments for furniture before the end of the year. The report is required under the Social Security Act 1980 to be laid before Parliament, but decisions on the timing of publication will be taken when my right hon. Friend has considered his response which will be published with the report.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many extra supplementary benefit recipients in receipt of additional allowances will become subject to the £1 available scale margin reduction as a consequence of the change in the regulations on 26 November; what savings will result; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to the replies given by my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson) to the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) on 21 June at columns 242-3.

Child Benefit

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will now phase out the disparities in child benefit rates between war widows and other widows by bringing them up to the higher level for both and make suitable transitional arrangements.

Mr. Newton: The rates of child benefit are the same for all. I assume the hon. Member has in mind the child dependency additions paid to widowed mothers and other long-term beneficiaries. We have no plans to raise these to the preferential rate paid to war widows.

National Council for Care of Elderly Dependants

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what changes in Government funding have occurred in 1984-85 and are planned for 1985-86 for the National Council for Care of Elderly Dependants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We are currently considering an application from the council for a grant of £20,000 this year. We expect to reach a decision very soon.

NHS (Manpower)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were employed in the National Health Service in England and Wales at the latest date; what were the corresponding figures for June 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The total number of NHS directly employed staff in England at 31 March 1984 (the latest date for which an overall total is available) was 819,100 (whole-time equivalent). Figures are not available for June 1979, since quarterly staffing returns had not been introduced at that time. The corresponding figure for September 1979 was 773,300. Details of the figures are in the Library.

Statistics on the NHS in Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people were employed by the Mersey regional health authority at the latest date; what was the corresponding figure for June 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The total number of NHS directly employed staff in Mersey RHA at 31 March 1984 (the latest date for which an overall total is available) was 43,900 (whole time equivalents). No figures are available for June 1979 since quarterly staffing returns had not been introduced at that time. The corresponding figure for September 1979 (which was the annual collection date) was 43,300.

Notes:

1. The figures quoted include agency nursing staff and locum medical and dental staff. They exclude hospital practitioners, part-time medical officers (clinical assistants), general medical practitioners participating in hospital staff funds and occasional sessional staff in community health services.
2. The latest date for which a count of total NHS staff in England is available is March 1984, since information on medical and dental staff is not collected quarterly.

Depo Provera

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the light of the findings of the United States Food and Drugs Administration, he will review the continued use of Depo Provera; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning repayment of mobility allowance wrongly withdrawn in the light of the Commissioner's decision R (M) 2/82; what reply he has sent; and if he will make a further statement.

Mr. Newton: I expect to be in a position to reply soon to a letter from the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation on this matter and I will also write to the right hon. Member.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) for each of the past five years how many applicants who were claiming mobility allowance succeeded in their claim on their first application;

(2) how many claims for mobility allowance have been made for each of the past five years;

(3) in each of the past five years how many claims for mobility allowance in England and Wales have been made by or on behalf of physically handicapped people;

(4) over each of the past five years what was the average time required for each stage of a mobility allowance claim (physically and mentally handicapped) to be processed;

(5) how many applicants who claimed for mobility allowance did not appeal after an initial refusal during each of the past five years;

(6) how many applicants succeeded in their claims for a mobility allowance after an appeal to the medical board in each of the last five years;

(7) how many applicants succeeded in their claims for a mobility allowance after an appeal to the medical appeal tribunal over each of the past five years;

(8) what guidance is given to the doctors who make assessments for mobility allowance;

(9) what proportion of applications for mobility allowance are successful, broken down by city or region in each of the last five years;

(10) how many claims for mobility allowance have been made by or on behalf of mentally handicapped people for each of the past five years.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Mental Health Act Commission

Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he has been able to assess the value of the work of the north-west region Mental Health Act commission following its first year of operation;

(2) if it is his intention to centralise the secretariat of the Mental Health Act commission;

(3) whether he proposes to change the existing adminstrative arrangements for the Mental Health Act commission regarding the maintenance of an adequately staffed regional office in the north-west;

(4) whether he will consider extending the role of the Mental Health Act commission to include the investigation of complaints from informal patients, particularly those who are effectively detained though still informal and those who complain about alleged coercive or restrictive practices.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what special hospitals are covered by the north-west region of the Mental Health Act commission.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Moss Side hospital and Park Lane hospital.

Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of the annual budget of the Mental Health Act commission is expended on section 58 second opinion medical fees.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Expenditure on second opinion medical fees is currently running at about 14 per cent. of the commission's annual budget.

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the preparation of the code of practice by the Mental Health Act commission; and when he intends to publish it.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people received a rate rebate through standard or certified housing benefit in the last full year for which figures are available.

Mr. Whitney: It is estimated that in autumn 1983, the latest date for which information is available, there were 3,070,000 certificated cases and 3,660,000 standard cases receiving rate rebates.

Doctors

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many doctors were unemployed in England and Wales at the latest available date; and what were the corresponding figures for June 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many doctors were employed in the National Health Service in England and Wales at the latest date; what were the figures for June 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: At 30 September 1983, the latest available date, there were some 43,400* doctors directly employed in the NHS in England. This includes locums but excludes hospital practitioners and doctors with paragraph 94 appointments, most of whom were general practitioners employed on a part-time basis in the hospital service. A comparable figure for 30 September 1979 is 40,300 but figures for June 1979 are not available. In addition there were some 25,300 general medical practitioners providing services under contract to the NHS in England on 1 October 1983, and 23,100 on the same date in 1979.

Statistics on the NHS in Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

*All figures rounded to the nearest 10.

Health Authorities (Appointments)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those bodies and organisations he has consulted with regard to appointments to each of the regional health authorities.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We always consider recommendations for appointments which reach us from any source and in particular from many hon. Members on both sides of the House. Many individuals put themselves forward as candidates and some of these prove suitable for appointment. However, in accordance with the National Health Service Act 1977 we have also consulted the relevant local authorities, universities, representatives of the main health professions, federations of workers organisations, other appropriate local interested or voluntary bodies and the regional health authority itself. The following national bodies or organisations have also been consulted.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many chairmen and members of district and regional health authorities have sent letters of resignation to him, citing as their reason dissatisfaction with Government policies, particularly with regard to privatisation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A few letters of resignation have included parting messages about particular concerns. We welcome constructive critical comment from health authority chairmen and members on any occasion including even their resignations.

Retrolental Fibroplasia

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current incidence of retrolental fibroplasia amongst newborn babies whose birth was premature; and how this compares with past trends.

Mr. John Patten: Details of the incidence and past trends of retrolental fibroplasia cannot be identified accurately from the statistical information collected centrally. I will write to the hon. Member.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is considering any proposals to change the numbers of community health council members or the ways in which they are appointed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the amount of funding by each regional health authority for community health councils for each of the past five years; and what has been the overall average allocation to community health councils for each of the past five years.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We do not collect information centrally on the funds allocated by regional health authorities to community health councils. Actual expenditure by the councils, as recorded in the annual accounts submitted by health authorities to the Department, is shown in the table. It is not possible to give an average figure for 1981-82 and 1982-83, as the number of councils changed during those years because of NHS restructuring.

Children (Growth)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take following his Department's national study, "Current Social Factors and the Growth of Pre-School Children", about height in one and two year-old children of the long-term unemployed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: A survey of pre-school children, undertaken for the Department and the Scottish Home and Health Department by the department of human nutrition at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine, has examined possible associations between a number of biological and social variables, including unemployment, and the attained height of one and two year old children.

The researchers state that no causal relationship can be claimed between any particular variable and attained height. A synopsis of the findings is due to be published next year as part of the third report on nutritional surveillance from the chief medical officer's committee on medical aspects of food policy.

Mortality Levels

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take following the results of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys longitudinal study about mortality levels in unemployed men and their wives; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: As stated in a reply given on 31 October at column 1085, this study was carried out by a research team based at the City university, as part of a programme of work financed by the Medical Research Council to analyse data compiled by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys.

I understand that a paper presenting some results from the study is to be published in a few weeks' time, in a medical journal. Ministers will carefully consider the findings once they have been published.

Disabled Persons (Discrimination)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases of alleged discrimination against disabled people have been received by his Department since 18 November 1983; what was the nature of the investigations undertaken into these cases; what was the outcome of these investigations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Since 18 November 1983, eight cases have been referred with sufficient evidence for us to investigate. In one case we are still awaiting confirmation that the individual concerned wished inquiries to be made on her behalf. In the remaining seven cases officials have made inquiries and sought the comments of the other parties involved. Three cases are still under consideration. Of the four concluded cases:

- one involved a genuine problem of access;
- one concerned an employer's judgment that the complainant's disability rendered her unsuitable for the appointment in question on safety grounds;
- one concerned the general rules of membership of a trade federation which are applicable to all candidates;
- one concerned a management judgment that an employee's overall performance, even after taking account of the limitation imposed by disability, was inadequate for promotion purposes.

In my judgment none of these cases revealed evidence of unjustified discrimination.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in view of the fact that no strike pay has been paid to members of the National Union of Mineworkers during the coal mining dispute, if he will now direct his Department's branches to pay the £15 per week that has been denied them since March.

Mr. Newton: The deduction of £15 from any supplementary benefit payable for the dependants of a person involved in a trade dispute is required by section 6 of the Social Security (No. 2) Act 1980. The intention is that the taxpayer should not have to bear the full cost of supporting strikers' families; either strikers themselves or their union should make some provision to maintain dependants. The deduction does not therefore depend upon payment of strike pay, nor is strike pay deemed to be in payment.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what conditions laid down by his Department miners and the families of miners engaged in industrial dispute must satisfy in order to receive exemptions from prescription charges.

Mr. Newton: The conditions of eligibility for free prescriptions are the same for strikers as for any other persons or families. These are age (children up to 16 or pensioners), certain specified illness and war disabilities, expectant and nursing mothers, and low income.

Departmental Staff (Retirements)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any staff of his Department at or above the level of assistant secretary have retired early; and whether any such staff have since been re-engaged either permanently or to carry out a specific task.

Mr. Fowler: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Specialist Claims Control

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the results of his investigation into the methods for calculating savings from the work of specialist claims control.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Cancer Patients (Prescription Charges)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Social Services if he will list the circumstances under which exemptions from prescription charges for those suffering from cancer can be obtained.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Exemption from prescription charges is available to people in the following groups, all of which may include individuals suffering from cancer:

1. Children under 16.
2. Men aged 65 or over and women aged 60 or over.
3. Pregnant women or women who have had a baby within the preceding 12 months.
4. People who get supplementary benefit, family income supplement or housing benefit supplement, their partners and dependants.
5. War or service pensioners (for items for their accepted disablement only).
6. People who qualify on low income grounds, their partners and dependants.
7. People who have—
   i. a permanent fistula (including caecostomy, colostomy, laryngostomy or ileostomy) requiring continuous surgical dressing or an appliance;
   ii. one of the following disorders for which specific substitution therapy is essential:
   Addison's disease and other forms of hypoadrenalism, diabetes insipidus and other forms of hypopituitarism, diabetes mellitus,
   hypoparathyroidism,
   myasthenia gravis,

myxoedema;

iii. epilepsy requiring continuous anti-convulsive therapy;

iv. a continuing physical disability which prevents the patient from leaving his residence without the help of another person.

NHS (Charges)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what he expects the total income from Health Service charges to be in 1984-85; and if he will estimate the income for 1985-86, assuming (a) no increases and (b) 12·5 per cent. increases;

(2) what is the proportion of Health Service expenditure covered by charges in 1984-85; and if he will estimate the proportion for 1985-86, assuming (a) no increases and (b) 12·5 per cent. increases.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The estimated total income from health service charges in 1984-85 is about £425 million. This represents approximately 3 per cent. of total Health Service expenditure. The estimates requested for 1985-86 are not available.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate how many persons over 16 years, and under pensionable age, are liable to pay prescription charges; and if he will estimate this as a percentage of the population in these age groups.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: People in the age ranges specified may qualify for exemption if:

they are in receipt of supplementary benefit, family income supplement or housing benefit supplement or are the partner or dependant of someone who is; or they qualify on low income grounds or are the partner or dependant of someone who does; or they are pregnant or have had a baby within the preceding 12 months; or they are war pensioners (where the exemption covers items prescribed for the accepted disablement only); or they suffer from a medical condition included in a limited list of conditions leading to exemption.

In addition, contraceptive substances and appliances are supplied without charge.

There is no reliable way of estimating the proportion of the population which might at any given time be entitled to exemption under these arrangements.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the real increase in prescription charges after allowing for inflation in the years 1979 to 1984 for each category of Health Service charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Health Authorities (Regional Strategic Plans)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has advised regional health authorities as to the reasonable time to be allowed for public consultation on a regional strategic plan.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. This is a matter for health authorities.

Broadmoor Hospital

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the redevelopment of Broadmoor hospital, Berkshire.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Broadmoor hospital is being completely redeveloped on its existing site. Following completion of certain advance works, construction of the first stage of the redevelopment of Broadmoor hospital started in February 1984. This stage, which comprises a new ward block, medical centre, central kitchen and stores, administration offices and gatehouse, is due for completion in Autumn 1986. Design work is proceeding on the second stage, which consists of two further ward blocks and an occupations/education complex. Construction is planned to start shortly after work on the first stage is completed. Further stages are planned to follow leading to completion of the new hospital in about 1997.

DEFENCE

Western European Union

Mr. Christopher Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on Government policy following the Rome declaration on the future of the Western European Union.

Mr. Renton: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) on 31 October, when I said that we have been working actively with our partners in the Western European Union to find ways of making better use of the organisation. We fully support the declaration and the document outlining institutional improvements which were agreed by Foreign and Defence Ministers at their meeting in Rome on 27 October and welcome their decision to meet regularly together within the WEU framework.

None of the measures which are to be taken to revitalise the WEU is intended to duplicate or undermine the Atlantic Alliance, which remains the foundation of our security. The activities of WEU can, however, help to bring about a stronger and more cohesive contribution to NATO from its members and increase public understanding of the European defence role within the alliance.

Ministry of Defence Stores (Fire Protection)

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Defence if it is his intention that automatic sprinkler protection will be incorporated in new and existing Ministry of Defence stores, containing exceptionally valuable and combustible items.

Mr. Lee: Yes, where this is regarded as appropriate.

Armed Services Youth Training Scheme

Sir Antony Buck asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there are any plans to allow women to be offered places in the Army's armed services youth training scheme.

Mr. Stanley: I am pleased to say that the Army is now able to offer places to young women as well as to young men and 50 places are being offered on training courses starting in February and March next year for training as supply controllers, drivers, switchboard operators, postal and courier operators, and kennelmaids and grooms.

This brings the Army into line with the Royal Navy and Royal Air Force which already offer places to young women in the armed services youth training scheme.

United States Forces (Exercises)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether United States forces in the United Kingdom have taken part in exercises in accordance with the joint United States Army-United States air force memorandum of understanding entitled, "Efforts for Enhancement of Joint Employment of the Airland Battle Doctrine," agreed on 21 April 1983.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether units of the United States air force based in Britain require formal agreement from his Department before conducting national exercises.

Mr. Stanley: Not normally.

NATO (Nuclear Planning Group)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on any agreements reached at the recent meeting of NATO's nuclear planning group.

Mr. Stanley: A summary of the NATO nuclear planning group meeting at Stresa on 11-12 October 1984 is contained in the final communiqué, a copy of which is in the Library.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Young asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel are on their second, third or any subsequent tour in the Falklands; how many of them (a) are in receipt of the Falklands allowance and (b) are not; and if he will consider changing the rules relating to the payment of the allowances payable after a certain number of days in the Falklands in that or any subsequent tour.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

Mr. Young asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many ships are on hire to Her Majesty's Government for work in the Falklands; and what is the cost, term and company concerned of each contract.

Mr. Stanley: There are currently 10 ships on charter for work in the Falklands. They are as follows:

Name	Company	Charter Dates
SS Uganda	P & O	3 January 1983	27 April 1985
MV Ice Lark	Sea Lion	6 February 1983	6 February 1986

MV Lumiere	Cunard	1 March 1984	31 August 1985

Costs paid to the owner of a chartered vessel are a commercially confidential matter between the Ministry of Defence and the owner concerned.

Boarding School Allowance Scheme

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the procedure by which a child educated under the boarding school allowance scheme for the children of Her Majesty's forces can move to another school than that orignally selected; and if he will specify what the implications of such a move are for receipt of the boarding school allowance.

Mr. Lee: Payment of boarding school allowance is normally conditional upon a child continuing to attend the school for which it was first authorised. The allowance regulations recognise that changes of school are necessary on completion of a stage of education, that is primary or secondary. Other changes of school may continue to attract payment of the allowance in certain circumstances, for example, ill-health, significant increase of school fees or significant alteration of a school's curriculum or standards. Cases which fail to satisfy these criteria are referred to the Ministry of Defence for decision and may result in forfeiture of future entitlement to the allowance and/or refund in part or whole of the allowance already paid for that stage of education. Each case is however considered on its merits; subject of course to compliance with the regulations.

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will list the number of children of Her Majesty's forces educated under the boarding school allowance scheme who changed school from that originally selected in each of the last 10 years; and whether he will list the schools involved under the heading used by his Department to record the reasons for such moves.

Mr. Lee: Some 21,500 children of service parents are educated under the boarding school allowance scheme but the Ministry of Defence does not maintain records of changes of school and the number of children affected. This information could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. The majority of changes of school arise on completion of a stage of education that is, cessation of primary schooling and commencement of the secondary stage. Other changes that arise are considered separately on their merits but the numbers involved are a small proportion of the whole.

Service Personnel (Schoolchildren)

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence how a decision is made on the suitability of a school for children of service personnel whose fees are paid in part or in full by Her Majesty's services; and what arrangements are made to ensure the continuing suitability of any such school.

Mr. Lee: The onus for deciding which school a service man's child should attend rests firmly on the parent. Among the factors that he should consider are that the school chosen is within his means, that it can provide continuity of education for a stage of education ie primary/secondary and that satisfactory arrangement exist for the child's welfare wherever he might be serving. He can obtain advice and assistance in making the choice from his local education officer who will usually recommend that he visits the chosen school before his child is entered. However the school chosen must be registered with the appropriate United Kingdom Department of Education and additionally the school authority or local education authority must manage, control and wholly maintain the facilities for the board and accommodation of the child.

Records are maintained of boarding schools attended by children of service parents and schools are visited periodically by officers of the Service Childrens Education Authority. Any cases of dissatisfaction with a particular school registered by individual parents are investigated by SCEA who may refer the matter to the appropriate United Kingdom Department of education.

School Fees

Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will describe the arrangements by which Her Majesty's forces pay school fees for children being educated in the United Kingdom, indicating the number of schools and the number of children involved in such arrangements in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Lee: The payment of school fees in respect of service men's children attending boarding schools in the United Kingdom is the responsibility of the parent. To assist in payment of those fees, boarding school allowance, within the approved limits is paid to the parent in advance separately for each school term on production of the requisite school bill. In the majority of cases, the allowance payable does not cover the full cost of the school fees.

A recent survey of boarding schools established that some 21,500 children of service parents attended approximately 800 different schools. Similar records are not maintained for previous years and this information could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

RAF Trainer

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in the selection of a new trainer for the Royal Air Force, he will beware of claims for unproven aircraft; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butler: We have received four tenders for a new RAF trainer and they will all be the subject of a very thorough technical and financial evaluation before a final selection is made.

Sir Patrick Wall asked the the Secretary of State for Defence when he will be making a decision for the replacement for the Jet Provost for Royal Air Force training.

Mr. Butler: It is hoped to announce a decision around the turn of the year.

Follow-on Force Attack

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he supports the adoption of the follow-on force attack concept by NATO.

Mr. Stanley: Yes, we support the adoption of the follow-on force attack concept by NATO for the reasons given in my answer to the hon. Lady on 29 October 1984 at col. 856-57, and in my speech in the House on 31 October 1984 at col. 1384-88.

Airland Battle Doctrine

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has made representations to the United States Government asking them to withdraw the airland battle doctrine from their European commands.

Mr. Stanley: No.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence in what way the United States airland battle doctrine is incompatible with NATO doctrine.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the airland battle doctrine has been discussed by NATO ambassadors in the defence planning committee.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

Warrior Preparation Centre

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any British officer has taken part in exercises at the United States European command Warrior Preparation Centre.

Mr. Stanley: Only as observers.

Pershing II

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the description by the United States Army of its Pershing II missile as a weapon for fire support is a description used by NATO.

Mr. Stanley: Pershing II is not regarded by NATO as a fire support weapon in the normal NATO usage of that term.

NATO Defence Ministers (Meeting)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence when and where is the next meeting of North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers.

Mr. Stanley: NATO's Defence Planning Committee will next meet in ministerial session in Brussels in December.

Procurement Contracts

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the percentage of procurement contracts placed by his Department directly with firms employing up to 200 employees in the last 12 months or other convenient period; and if he will break down this percentage between sea, land, air and general support functions.

Mr. Butler: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Lee) to my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) on 24 May at columns 552-53. The exercise currently in hand regarding the percentage of direct contracts placed with smaller firms covers the year to 31 March 1985. The results will not be available until the middle of next year.

Ministry of Defence Police

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the duties of the Ministry of Defence police; to whom the chief constable of the Ministry of Defence police reports; and what complaints procedure exists for matters relating to the actions of this force.

Mr. Lee: It is the duty of the Ministry of Defence Police to protect and police Ministry of Defence establishments and to protect Crown property. The chief constable reports to the second permanent under-secretary of state. In common with other police forces in England and Wales the Ministry of Defence police are subject to the complaints procedure which was established by the Police Act 1976.

Services Medical Organisation (Equipment)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the catalogue of medical equipment used within the Services Medical Organisation.

Mr. Lee: The "British Joint Services Catalogue of Medical Equipment" is a classified internal Ministry of Defence document. For this reason it would not be appropriate to place a copy in the House of Commons Library.

Drugs (Prescribing and Dispensing)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will estimate the potential savings to be made from the generic prescribing and dispensing of drugs in the armed services;

(2) if it is his policy to promote generic prescribing and dispensing of drugs in the armed services.

Mr. Lee: It has long been Ministry of Defence policy to insist on generic dispensing of drugs, whatever the prescription, when a generic equivalent of the item prescribed exists. The Ministry of Defence therefore, already achieves the full economies of generic dispensing and there are consequently no further potential savings in this respect.

Switzerland (Purchases)

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for Defence what military purchases have been made from the United Kingdom by Switzerland since 1954.

Mr. Butler: Substantial purchases have been made, but it has been the practice of successive Administrations not to publicise details of individual defence sales contracts.

HMS Conqueror (Log Book)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the rank of the most senior officer known to have seen the log book of HMS Conqueror after it left the ship.

Mr. Heseltine: That is a matter for the board of inquiry.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the terms of reference of the court of inquiry into the loss of the log book of HMS Conqueror; and by when and to whom it is to report.

Mr. Heseltine: The board of inquiry is to inquire into the circumstances attending the apparent disappearance of Conqueror's control room log. It will report to the Commander in Chief Fleet when it has reached its findings.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the loss of the navigator's log book of HMS Conqueror was first discovered; and by whom the loss was notified.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Defence when was the loss of the log book from HMS Conqueror first discovered; and by whom.

Mr. Heseltine: The first indications that the control room log could be missing appeared in the first week of October when an official in my Department asked to see it in the context of answering parliamentary inquiries.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will call in the Metropolitan Police to investigate the loss of the log book from HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Heseltine: The disappearance of HMS Conqueror's log is being investigated by a Royal Navy board of inquiry. Until its report is available, no consideration can be given as to whether the Metropolitan police should be involved.

Nuclear Submarines (Log Books)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the security classification of the navigator's log book on nuclear submarines.

Mr. Heseltine: Once entries have been made in the control room log kept by the navigating officer of a nuclear submarine this document is classified confidential.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place a copy of a navigator's log book of a nuclear submarine in the Library for inspection by hon. Members.

Mr. Heseltine: I have placed a copy of an uncompleted control room log for a submarine in the House of Commons Library.

FH 70 Ammunition

Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has received any representations from the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany regarding possible later delivery by that Government of FH 70 ammunition.

Mr. Butler: No.

Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, under the 1970 three country arrangement between the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany and Italy, the Federal Republic of Germany has now successfully manufactured the FH 70 shell.

Mr. Butler: Final qualification of the German shell line is expected shortly.

West Germany (Shell-filling Capacity)

Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Defence what financial contribution Her Majesty's Government are making toward the cost of the Federal Republic of Germany's shell-filling facility.

Mr. Butler: None.

120 F/S Shot

Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to place an order for 120 F/S shot.

Mr. Butler: We hope to place an order very shortly.

Fighting Ships (Log Books)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many log books of fighting ships of the Royal Navy have been lost since May 1979; and if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the ships concerned and the date when the log books were reported missing.

Mr. Heseltine: I am arranging for a check to be made that no log books have been mislaid, apart from those from HMS Conqueror which I reported to the House on Wednesday 7 November. I will write to the hon. Member when the check is complete. No log books have been reported missing.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether navigator's log books of fighting ships of the Royal Navy are always classified documents.

Mr. Heseltine: Once entries have been made in submarine log books these books are classified. Navigation log books for surface ships are unclassified.

The European Community has allotted over 117,000 tonnes of cereals to Ethiopia over the same period, as well as other products. NATIONAL FINANCE

Indecent and Obscene Material

Mr. Wheeler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a detailed statement setting out the guidance given to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise officers so as to enable an officer to exercise his judgment when deciding to detain imported material considered indecent or obscene.

Mr. Hayhoe: All officers engaged on customs work undergo a period of training and their course covers all aspects of import prohibitions including that on indecent or obscene material. However, Customs do not rely on one person's judgment alone and any case where there is doubt or where the decision is queried is submitted to a specialist branch in their headquarters. This branch carefully monitors court decisions on what is currently regarded as indecent or obscene and is guided by them. It also ensures that local staff are kept fully aware of contemporary interpretation of the law. Importers of course have the right to challenge any particular decision on alleged indecency or obsenity in the Courts.

Mr. Wheeler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out for the most recent 12-month period the number of seizures of presumed indecent or obscene material; and what were the figures for each of the previous five years.

Mr. Hayhoe: It is regretted that the information is not readily available.

Oil (Gross Domestic Product Earnings)

Mr. Wilson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will incorporate the gross domestic product earnings from oil produced in the Scottish sector of the North sea as determined under the 1968 Continental Shelf Jurisdiction Order, into Scottish gross domestic product figures given in official publications.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Wilson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the figure for the financial year 1983-84 for the gross domestic product of the United Kingdom continental shelf region; and if he will give the estimated figure for the year 1984-85.

Mr. Peter Rees: Estimated gross domestic product of the continental shelf in 1983 was £15·7 billion. Forecasts for any future years are not available.

Trustee Savings Banks

Mr. Nellist asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations, and from what sources, he has received in favour of the transfer of the trustee savings banks to private sector status.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The plans for the transfer of the trustee savings banks to fully-fledged private sector status have been drawn up on the basis of proposals made by the TSB Central Board in consultation with the Treasury. In addition to my discussions with the TSB Central Board and representatives of the individual TSBs, I have received a small number of letters from hon. Members and members of the public asking about particular aspects of the proposals.

Fontainebleau Agreement

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to set out the detailed conditions necessary to satisfy the financial mechanisms required by the Government arising from the Fontainebleau agreement.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 12 November 1984, c. 90]: The Fontainebleau arrangements are still under discussion within the Community, but the Government will lay the relevant documents before the House when these negotiations are completed.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agricultural Development and Advisory Service

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the future of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service.

Mr. Jopling: When Professor Ronald Bell joined my Ministry as the new director general of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service, I asked him to give particular attention during his first six months to developing his views on the future shape and direction of ADAS. I asked him in particular to consider whether present ADAS priorities needed to be revised; whether some services could satisfactorily be provided by the private sector; and whether and how far there is scope for transferring to the user the cost of the services provided.

Professor Bell has consulted widely with interested organisations and individuals in the industry as well as in the Ministry and his report, which is published today, provides a clear view of the way in which the service should develop over the next decade.

He concluded that ADAS was an effective and dedicated service held in high esteem by the industry to which it had rendered valuable service, but that certain changes of approach and style of operation are now needed. In particular he recommended:

(i) a refocusing of the ADAS effort at present devoted to Research and Development so as particularly to concentrate on the Development end of the spectrum;
(ii) a commitment to the use of computer-based information technology as the method by which a great deal of information and advice is provided to the industry in the late 1980s;
(iii) consideration should be given to the possibilities of charging users for part or all of any service (including work under statutory schemes) where there is an identifiable benefit to the customer;
(iv) greater emphasis should be given to conservation and animal welfare work.

I endorse Professor Bell's view of the value of the work ADAS has done and I believe he has correctly identified the direction in which ADAS should move in the future. I therefore intend to proceed to a detailed examination of what would be involved in the implementation of his recommendations. The report raises a number of substantial questions which will need careful consideration. In particular, I endorse the conclusion that in principle it seems entirely appropriate that farmers and others in the industry who avail themselves of these services should contribute to their cost, and I believe that, if Parliament approved the necessary legislation in time, it would be reasonable to envisage roughly 20 per cent. of the total cost of ADAS being met in this way by 1987-88. But the necessity for primary legislation to give effect to this emphasises the need for further work before detailed and final decisions can be taken. Adequate time will be allowed for this and for the necessary consultations with the many interests concerned.

I am having this further work put in hand immediately and will welcome the views of the interests concerned so that these can be taken into account in the final decisions on the implementation of this report. I have arranged for copies of the report to be deposited in the Library of the House, and copies will also be available from the Vote Office.

Butter Stocks

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from retail traders concerning EEC proposals to dispose of surplus stocks of butter in the United Kingdom; what discussions he has had on this subject with the European Commission, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: The retail trade and others involved in supplying butter have made it clear that they regard special sales of Community butter stocks as highly disruptive. They also consider that such sales over the Christmas period do little to increase consumption, which in any case tends to be higher at that time. I pressed the Agriculture Commissioner to consider promoting the sale of butter by means of a more general subsidy payable over a longer period. He was not prepared to do this. However, the Commission's regulation does include the flexibility needed to permit the special sale to take place in the new year, when it may be more effective in increasing sales of butter.

Sir Hector Monro asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the detailed arrangements for implementing the European Community special sale of butter stocks.

Mr. Jopling: The Butter (EEC Special Sale) Regulations laid today provide for the implementation of this scheme in the United Kingdom. They provide for a maximum price of 42p per 250g pack, for the labelling of packs with the inscription "Special Sale—EEC" and for the advertising of the butter when it is on sale starting from 14 January 1985. The regulations also provide for the necessary enforcement arrangements and penalties. A total of 39,200 tonnes of UK produced butter from Community butter stocks will be made available to consumers under these arrangements.

Poultry Industry

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will assess the effect on the competitiveness of the British poultry industry of the poultrymeat hygiene regulations; and what information he has about the enforcement of such regulations in other member states of the EEC.

Mrs. Fenner: I am aware that in certain member states the EC poultrymeat hygiene legislation is less effectively enforced than in this country. The Government have taken steps to reduce the resulting distortion of competition and are continuing to seek an equitable permanent solution.

Sole (Total Allowable Catches)

Mr. Maclean asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the Commission's recent proposals to increase the total allowable catches for 1984 for sole in the English channel have yet been adopted.

Mr. MacGregor: I am glad to report that the Commission's proposals to increase the TACs for sole in the English Channel have now been formally adopted by the Council. At our request the figure for western Channel (VIIe) sole was increased by a further 50 tonnes beyond that proposed by the Commission. The UK quotas for western and eastern (VIId) Channel sole will therefore both be increased by 80 tonnes. These increases should on present informtion mean that there will be no closure of these fisheries in 1984.

ENERGY

Coal Mining Dispute (Secondary Picketing)

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he or his officials have had with nationalised energy industries regarding the seeking of injunctions by the industries against secondary picketing of its installations in the current miners' dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: My right hon. Friend has been in close touch with the Chairman of the nationalised energy industries in connection with matters arising from the miners' dispute.

The Government have made clear that they would not wish to discourage any employers from using the legal remedies which are available to them as a result of employment legislation. Action under these provisions, however, must be a judgment for individual managements.

Coal Imports

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) how much coal, and from which countries, has been imported into the United Kingdom since the beginning of the mining dispute to the latest date for which figures are available;

(2) if any coal has been imported from Vietnam since the beginning of the miners' strike;

(3) how much coal has been imported from Poland since March to the latest date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Information about the volumes of coal which have been imported into the United Kingdom is provided in the "Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom" which is available in the Library of the House.

Sizewell Inquiry

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will provide a breakdown of the total cost of the public inquiry appertaining to Sizewell B power station to date; and how these costs have been or are to be met;

(2) what percentage of the total cost of the public inquiry appertaining to Sizewell B power station is accounted for by objectors' costs.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on Thursday 25 October at column 431 to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing).

WALES

Motorways

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of kilometres of motorway (a) in use, (b) under construction and (c) planned but not under construction on 1 November for the years 1983 and 1984.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The information is as follows:

Number of kilometres of motorways in Wales	1 November 1983	1 November 1984
In Use	120	120
Under Construction	NIL	NIL
Planned but not under construction	10	10

Holyhead

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list all financial aid given over the last five years to the area of Holyhead, stating the projects for which it was granted;

(2) if he will list all urban aid and other applications to his Department for financial assistance for the area of Holyhead for the last five years stating which have been granted.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Secure Psychiatric Unit

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Wales what progress is being made in establishing a regional secure psychiatric unit in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Welsh Office issued a consultation paper in June this year entitled "Proposals for Consultation on the provision of Medium Secure Therapeutic Units in Wales: Policy Appraisal". This reassessed the demand for psychiatric facilities for those who need care in conditions of greater security than is usually provided at local psychiatric hospitals but less than that provided at the special hospitals. It also considered how the estimated demand might best be met over the next 10 years. The paper, a copy of which is in the Library, concluded that in addition to the existing secure provision at North Wales hospital, Denbigh, which has been funded by the Welsh Office, there should be across Wales three or four additional units each of 15 to 20 beds.

We are considering carefully the comments which have recently been received on the document, and when my right hon. Friend has taken decisions a further appraisal will be conducted to determine the most appropriate siting. There will then be further public consultation on the proposals.

Approval has also been given to an 11-bed expansion of Garth Angharad hospital, near Dolgellau. This will be centrally funded and run as a regional service. It offers a valuable facility for young people whose special psychiatric needs cannot be catered for at local hospitals.

A483 (Improvements)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much money has been spent on improvements to the A483 in Wales since 1974; how much is earmarked for this purpose for each of the next three years; and how many miles have been improved since 1974.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: A number of small improvement schemes have been undertaken on the A483 in Wales but details of the length improved since 1 April 1974 are not readily available. In this period more than £9 million cash has been spent on improvements and preparation work for future schemes. forecast expenditure on major schemes in the next three years is estimated at:

	£ million
1985-86	4·3
1986-87	19·9
1987-88	20·8

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many unemployed (a) 16-year-olds, (b) 17-year-olds and (c) 18-year-olds are registered in Wales;

(2) how many people in (a) Wales, (b) Mid-Glamorgan and (c) Clwyd have been jobless for 12 months, for 24 months, for 36 months, and for 48 months, respectively.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: This information is available in the House of Commons library.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many registered disabled people are jobless in Wales; and how many have been jobless for more than 12 months.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information on the number of registered disabled people who are unemployed is available only for those who choose to register for employment at jobcentres and careers offices. In September 1984 there were 2,566 registered disabled and 4,851 unregistered disabled job seekers unemployed. Detailed information in respect of the length of time these registrants have been unemployed is not available.

Special Employment Programmes

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people in Wales are engaged in special employment programmes.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The number of people covered by the special employment and training measures in Wales at the end of September 1984 is estimated as follows:

	Numbers
Community Industry	960
Community Programme	8,790
Enterprise Allowance Scheme	2,470
Job Release Scheme	3,420
Job Splitting Scheme	140
Young Workers Scheme	4,630
Youth Training Scheme	21,370
	41,780

Redundancies

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many redundancies have been announced in Wales in each year from 1979-80 to 1983-84; and how many have been declared since April 1984.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I am informed by the Manpower Services Commission that the number of notified redundancies in Wales in the years concerned was as follows:

	Number
1979	11,663
1980	45,215
1981	36,432
1982	24,647
1983	16,041
*1984	8,666

* Up to September.

Between April 1984 and September 1984 the figure was 5,635.

Job Creation

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of (a) the number of service industry jobs created in Wales since 1979 and (b) the number of manufacturing jobs created in Wales since 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Comprehensive information is not available for either the service industries or the manufacturing sector. However, since 1 May 1979 projects for which offers of selective financial assistance were accepted, or which were allocated Government-financed factories, promised to provide over 67,000 jobs.

Manufacturing Industry (Job Losses)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many manufacturing jobs have been lost in Wales since 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information on net changes in employment levels based on estimates of the number of employees in employment compiled by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment indicates that between June 1979 and June 1984 there was a decrease of 100,000 in the number of employees in employment in the manufacturing sector in Wales.

Derelict Land Reclamation

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total level of expenditure by his Department on derelict land reclamation in Wales for each of the years from 1979-80 to 1983-84; and what is the estimated level of expenditure for 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Welsh Development Agency took over responsibility for derelict land reclamation from the Welsh Office in 1976. Total expenditure since 1979 on derelict land schemes funded by the WDA and on residual Welsh Office projects approved before 1976 was as follows:

	£ million
1979-80	7·8
1980-81	9·1
1981-82	10·9
1982-83	10·2
1983-84	11·7

In the current year over £9 million is expected to be spent on WDA and Welsh Office schemes. No decisions have yet been taken on the likely expenditure provision for this activity in 1985-86. It is also anticipated that expenditure associated with land reclamation will be aided under the urban development grant programme.

British Rail

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are employed by British Rail in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The latest date for which information is currently available is 1981 when the number employed was of the order of 11,600.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The annual census of National Health Service employees is carried out each September. At 30 September 1983, the latest date for which figures are available, there were 63,704 staff employed with a whole-time equivalent of 54,131.

Aerospace Industry

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are employed by the aerospace industry in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Current information relates to September 1981 when 6,512 people were employed in the aerospace industry in Wales.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the cost of linking by dual carriageway the A5 at Newbridge to the Chester southerly bypass; what is the length of this projected roadway; and what is the estimated cost, and start and completion dates of each of the proposed sections of the road.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The information is as follows:

Chester–Bangor (Dual Carriageway)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his revised estimate of the cost of providing a dual carriageway road between Chester and Bangor; and if he will express this as an estimated cost per mile and indicate the estimated date of completion.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The provisional programme envisages the substantial completion of the upgrading of the A55 in Wales by the end of the decade subject to the satisfactory completion of engineering design and the statutory procedures and to the availability of resources. The estimated cost of planned schemes and those in progress is about £430 million—an average cost of about £12 million a mile.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much money has so far been expended on the projected Chester–Bangor A55 dual carriageway; and if he will list the length and cost of each completed section.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Excluding expenditure on planned schemes and those in progress, the information is as follows:

	Date completed	Length miles (kms)	Cost (£m cash)
Abergele bypass	1968	3·6 (5·8)	1·988
Aber to Tair Meibion	1969	1·5 (2·3)	0·211

A55 (Colwyn Bay Section)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects the Colwyn Bay section of the A55 dual carriageway scheme to be opened; what is its length; and what is his estimate of its cost and its opening date.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The Llanddulas to Rhos-on-Sea interchange section of the A55 is expected to be opened on 7 December and the remaining length to Glan Conwy in the spring of 1985; the total length of both sections is 6·8 miles and the total cost is currently estimated to be £126 million.

Housing Associations

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much money was granted to the housing associations of Wales in 1983-84; what is the estimated provision in 1984-85; and what is the change in real terms in the amount of money allocated to the housing associations in Wales for 1984-85 as compared with the level of expenditure in 1979-80.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Capital allocations to housing associations in Wales through the Housing Corporation were £41 million and £39 million for 1983-84 and 1984-85, respectively. The allocation for 1984-85 is some 3 per cent. higher in real terms than that for 1979-80.

Milk Processing Plants

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many milk processing plants exist in Wales; how many people are currently employed in them; and what is his provisional estimate as to (a) which plants may close or suffer partial closure and (b) how many jobs will be lost following the implementation of the Dairy Milk Quota Regulations 1984.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: It is estimated that there are some 40 plants involved in the preparation of milk and milk products in Wales employing around 3,000 full-time employees.

It is a matter for the companies concerned to determine in their commercial judgment the future capacity that will be required.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Guatemala

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government have had recently or intend to have discussions with the Government of Guatemala.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend met the Guatemalan Minister for Foreign Affairs in San Jose in September during the meeting between European and Central and Latin American Foreign Ministers. The possibility of resuming consular relations broken off by Guatemala in 1981 was discussed. There will be further talks at official level in due course.

EC (Own Resources)

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had in the Council of Ministers regarding an increase in own resources.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The question of an increase in own resources was discussed at the Foreign Affairs Council on 2 and 3 October. Member states agreed to meet the Community's inescapable financial obligations, including our abatement in respect of 1984, on the revenue side as agreed at Fontainebleau. All but one member state agreed that this should be done by bringing forward a limited amount of new own resources into 1985. The question will be discussed again at the next Foreign Affairs Council.

Middle East

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent visit to the middle east.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I visited Lebanon and Israel between 28 and 30 October. In Lebanon I was able to reaffirm to President Gemayel our support for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from his country. In Israel, I had friendly and open discussions with Israeli Ministers, primarily on the problems of Lebanon and on the Arab-Israel dispute. I also had a most useful meeting with Palestinian representatives.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs under what circumstances Her Majesty's Government will fund the armed forces of the Crown to serve in the middle east in territory invaded by and occupied by Israel; and if such criteria apply to Lebanese, Egyptian, Jordanian and Syrian territory.

Mr. Luce: The 10 members of the European Community have said that they are prepared to participate in international guarantees for a peace settlement of the Arab-Israel dispute. The multinational force and observers in Sinai includes a small British headquarters contingent. There are no current plans to station further British contingents in the region.

Western European Union

Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made at recent ministerial meetings of the Western European Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 12 November.

Michelle and Victoria Wolstenholme

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has had about the abduction of Michelle and Victoria Wolstenholme; what action is being taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Inquiries by the children's mother's solicitors were answered on 15 and 20 August 1984. The only other representations have been the right hon. Gentleman's letters to my right hon. and learned Friend of 24 October and 4 November, to which my right hon. and learned Friend has replied. This correspondence has been copied to Her Majesty's embassy in Madrid and Her Majesty's consulate in Malaga with instructions to bring to the notice of the competent authorities the existence of an English court order declaring the children wards of court and to seek their assistance in tracing the children.

Falkland Islands

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Falkland Islanders are employed by his Department in the Falkland Islands and in what capacity; and how rates of pay compare with the equivalent grade of British personnel with whom they are working.

Mr. Renton: None. Those Falkland Islander who work for the Civil Commissioner as domestic staff are employees of the Falkland Islands Government.

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why prescription charges are not made for drugs supplied in the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Renton: I am consulting the Falkland Islands Government and will write to the hon. Member.

Cyprus

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the efforts being made by Her Majesty's Government to ensure that the United Nations resolution on the future of Cyprus is carried out.

Mr. Renton: Recent United Nations Security Council resolutions on Cyprus (for example SCR 541 and SCR 550 of November 1983 and May 1984 respectively) have requested the United Nations Secretary-General to pursue his mission of good offices in order to achieve progress towards a settlement in Cyprus. We have been active with all the parties concerned in support of the Secretary-General's present initiative and stand ready to assist him further.

Ethiopia

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the names of hon. Members who have visited Ethiopia during the past three years, and to whom official facilities have been extended by Her Majesty's Government or the Ethiopian Government; and if he will give a breakdown in the Official Report of the total costs involved, and by whom those costs were borne.

Mr. Rifkind: I shall write to the hon. Member.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Mercury Communications

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether, in the light of the withdrawal of two principal backers, he contemplates further assistance to Mercury Communications.

Mr. Butcher: The granting of a licence on 5 November by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry under section 7 of the Telecommunications Act 1984 indicates the Government's commitment to the success of Mercury Communications. the fact that Mercury is about to become a wholly owned subsidiary of Cable and Wireless is entirely a commercial matter. Those concerned have made clear their belief that the new arrangements will work to the advantage of Mercury as it expands its operations, and there is no call for any Government involvement in this matter.

British Telecom

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he proposes to take to increase competition in the area of communications technology arising from the monopoly of British Telecom.

Mr. Pattie: The Government's commitment to the development of competition in telecommunications and the policies designed to secure that objective were set out in the statements made by my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) on 17 November 1983 and 20 July 1984. I have nothing to add to those statements.

Textile Industry

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement outlining the proposals he has made to the European Commission in respect of Northern Ireland under the non-quota programme for the development of new economic activities in areas affected by the restructuring of the textile industry; and what considerations the Government took account of in formulating these proposals.

Mr. Trippier: The European Commission is currently considering the United Kingdom's proposed programmes under the non-quota section of the European regional development fund.

I understand that decisions are expected shortly. Announcements concerning the measures to be introduced in the qualifying areas of the United Kingdom, including Northern Ireland, will be made as soon as the Commission's decision is known.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much of the money allocated to Northern Ireland under the non-quota programme for the development of new economic activities in areas affected by the restructuring of the textile industry will be designated for each of the 26 district council areas in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Trippier: The whole of Northern Ireland is eligible under the ERDF non-quota regulations for textile areas, and no specific allocation on the basis of district council areas is proposed.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which schemes submitted under the European regional development fund non-quota textile measures submitted by (a) Lancashire county council, (b) Burnley borough council and (c) North East Lancashire Development Association are likely to receive approval.

Mr. Trippier: No applications for aid have yet been invited, since the European commission is still considering the United Kingdom's proposed non-quota programmes, including that of textile areas. My right hon. Friend will make an announcement as soon as the Commission's approval, which I understand is expected shortly, is made known.

Inventions

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps the Government are taking to permit private firms to tender for the right to exploit commercially public sector inventions.

Mr. Butcher: With the ending of the British Technology Group's right of first refusal to the exploitation of public sector inventions, which was announced by the Prime Minister on September 12 last year, it will be open to private sector firms to seek more business of this kind.

Alvey Programme

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) in respect of how many United States controlled companies applications to participate in the Alvey programme are pending; and to which projects these applications relate;

(2) how many United States controlled companies now participate in the Alvey programme and in respect of which projects.

Mr. Pattie: Two US controlled companies are included in the various consortia who have applied for support from the Alvey programme, and the relevant applications are in the areas of man machine interface and intelligent knowledge based systems. No formal offers have yet been made in respect of these applications but this now depends only on the finalisation of the contractual details, including the collaboration agreement between the partners.

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether it is the policy of Her Majesty's Government that the ownership of patents and other intellectual property rights arising from the Alvey programme should reside in the participants.

Mr. Pattie: The intellectual property rights arising from an Alvey project will be vested in the non-academic participants as set out in their collaboration agreement which will also contain the terms for recompensing the academic participants for their contribution.

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the participation of United States controlled companies in the Alvey programme.

Mr. Pattie: Companies eligible for support under the Alvey programme are those established in the United Kingdom, with relevant expertise to contribute, who are ready to collaborate and to exploit the technology arising from the programme to the benefit of the United Kingdom.

Holiday Property Bonds (BBC Programme)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will obtain a transcript of the BBC Radio 4 "Money Box" programme broadcast on Saturday 27 October to investigate the legitimacy of the holiday property bond scheme to ensure that all existing and respective bond holders have adequate legal protection.

Mr. Fletcher: I have obtained the transcript of "The Money Box" programme concerning this scheme, which is being studied to determine whether any aspects fall within my Department's jurisdiction and if so whether any action is necessary.

The holiday property bond scheme is operated from the Isle of Man by companies incorporated there, but is marketed in this country by a United Kingdom company, Villa Owners Club Limited. My Department has no jurisdiction over Isle of Man companies but I am considering the position regarding the marketing of the bond in this country.

Guarantees

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will introduce legislation to provide that claims made under guarantees for goods supplied are settled within a specified period of time;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to provide that guarantees which accompany goods contain enough information for the customers to know who has given the guarantee and whether an insurance scheme is involved.

Mr. Fletcher: I have no plans at present to introduce legislation on guarantees. The Director General of Fair Trading published in August a discussion paper "Consumer Guarantees" which put forward for comment by 31 December 1984 some preliminary recommendations, including those mentioned in these questions. I understand the Director General will be examining responses to that paper with a view to publishing a final report in the new year.

Franchise Businesses

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what details he has of the number of franchise businesses which have been set up in Yorkshire and Humberside in the last three years; and if these businesses can be broken down by type of franchise.

Mr. Trippier: This information is not available in my Department.

Fair Competition (British Telecom)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many complaints of alleged prevention of fair competition by British Telecom have been reported to the Office of Telecommunications.

Mr. Butcher: This is a matter for the Director General of Telecommunications and I have drawn my hon. Friend's question to his attention.

Selling by Telephone

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans the Government have to introduce new guidelines on selling by telephone.

Mr. Fletcher: As proposed in his report on "Selling by Telephone", which was published on 4 October, the Director General of Fair Trading is to encourage the adoption of new guidelines by all firms responsible for initiating or making unsolicited telephone approaches to consumers. This is the most appropriate course.

Pirate Radio Stations

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of Trade and Industry if he will list in the Official Report all pirate radio stations known to his Department to be currently operating within England and Wales.

Mr. Butcher: I am aware of the following inland stations currently transmitting in the broadcasting bands:

Andromeda Radio
Greek Voice of London
London Greek Radio

Radio Jackie
Radio Shoestring
Skyline Radio
Solar Radio
South East Sound
Storeton Community Radio
Sunshine Radio
Voice of the Immigrant

My Department is aware of other stations which have been operating recently but have been subject to action by the radio investigation service and are not currently broadcasting.

Coal Imports

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list, by volume, the coal imports to the United Kingdom for each month since January 1984 from Poland, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, West Germany, France, Belgium, Australia and South Africa.

Mr. Fletcher: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Radio Investigation Service

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he intends to increase the staff of the radio investigation service.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply 12 November 1984, c. 86]: My right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) informed the House on 13 April of the Government's intention to review the functions of the radio investigation service to determine what resources it needs. That review is still in progress and I cannot anticipate its conclusions.

TRANSPORT

M40 (Oxford-Birmingham)

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether, when the inspector's report on the inquiry into the M40 Oxford-Birmingham motorway is submitted to him, he will place the duty of evaluating and preparing submissions to him on the report and decision in the hands of a separate part of his Department which has had no connection with the promotion of that scheme or with its justification and defence at the public inquiry.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for the Environment received the independent inspector's report in May. A decision should be announced around the end of the year. It has been established in case law that making use of the technical and factual expertise of officials who have an intimate knowledge of the proposals and the objections to them is a correct part of the decision-making process.

Public Service Vehicle Test

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what was the percentage failure rate in England for the annual public service vehicle test; and how this compares with the immediate two preceding years;

(2) how many vehicles in England failed the annual public service vehicle test in the last year for which figures are available.

Mrs. Chalker: Statutory annual testing of public service vehicles was not introduced until 1982. The results of informal yearly inspections carried out before then are not available.

Details of annual tests in England for the two complete years 1982-83 and 1983-84 and for the current year from April to September are as follows:

	1982-83	1983-84	†1984-85
Number of tests	53,485	52,785	24,534
Number failed*	12,782	10,853	4,190
Percentage failed*	23·90	20·56	17·07

* These results exclude vehicles which had defects which were rectified during the course of the test.
† 6 months.

Motorways

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport, for the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, what are the number of kilometres of (a) trunk motorways, (b) other trunk roads, (c) local authority motorways, (d) other principal roads and (e) other roads.

Mrs. Chalker: The information is as follows:

Road Lengths (kilometres) as at 1 April: Great Britain

	1982	1983	1984
(a) Trunk Motorways*	2,254	2,606	2,692
(b) Other Trunk Roads	12,319	12,322	12,416
(c) Local Authority Motorways*	98	103	100
(d) Other Principal Roads	34,510	34,587	34,746
(d) Other Roads	293,811	295,361	297,422

* Excluding slip-roads.

Notes: 1984 data are provisional and the 1982 figures incorporate revisions to previously published material.

The data for 1982 differ from those published in "Transport Statistics Great Britain 1972-82" because they incorporate revisions made after publication.

The data for 1984 are provisional.

Local Authority motorways dropped from 103 kilometres in 1983 to 100 kilometres in 1984 because of, inter alia, the trunking of 3·8 kilometres of the Eccles bypass in Greater Manchester.

Motorway Repairs

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in the Official Report all projected motorway repairs currently being undertaken and those likely to be so in the next six months.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested is as follows. In addition, other works may be necessary—for example, where emergency repairs are needed to the safety barrier. Such works cannot be predicted in advance, but they tend to be of short duration.

Goods Vehicle Operator Licensing

Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has now considered the scrutiny carried out of goods vehicle operator licensing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have today placed copies of the scrutiny, incorporating my response, in the Libraries of both Houses.

Driving Test Organisation

Mr. Ward asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has now considered the scrutiny carried out of the driving test organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have today placed copies of the scrutiny, incorporating my response, in the Libraries of both Houses.

Steeple Langford Bypass

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he will announce his decision on the preferred route of the Steeple Langford bypass near Salisbury.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I am endeavouring to reconcile the views expressed as a result of the public consultation with the relative economics and environmental effects of the alternative schemes.

I regret that at present I am unable to forecast when an announcement will be made, but I am conscious of the need to do this as soon as possible.

Driving Licences (Recognition)

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to extend the recognition of driving licences to further countries outside the European Community.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Road Traffic (Driving Licences) Act 1983 gives the Secretary of State power to designate countries and territories where he is satisfied with the provisions for granting licences to drive. Their licences would then be exchangeable for British ordinary licences. The power does not extend to vocational licences.

As required by the Act, representative organisations are being invited to give their views on a second list of designations, which would come into effect on 2 February 1985. The countries concerned are Barbados, the British Virgin Islands, the Republic of Cyprus, Finland, Malta and Zimbabwe.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authorities (Finance)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total amount held in (a) special funds and (b) rate fund balances by each of the 18 authorities designated under the Rates Act 1984, at the end of 1982-83 and 1983-84 according to his Department's figures.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: From outturn forms returned by local authorities the information is as follows:

Acid Rain

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what response the Government are making to the current concern regarding acid rain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government's views on the problem of acid deposition will be set out in our response to the fourth report of the House of Commons Environment Committee, Session 1983-84, to be published very shortly.

Borough of Brent (Expenditure)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he received from the chief executive and other officers of the London borough of Brent (a) before and (b) after 24 October concerning the council's intentions about tailoring expenditure to live within the Government's limits.

Mr. Waldegrave: The chief executive of the London borough of Brent wrote to my Department on 31 July asking for information before advising the members of his council whether or not to see a redetermination of Brent's expenditure level. My Department has received no other correspondence from officers of the council about rate limitation.

Local Authorities (Manpower Returns)

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will arrange to have emergency planning staff excluded from local authority manpower returns.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has no proposals for changing the coverage of the Joint Manpower Watch survey.

Beaches (Pollution)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to require local authorities to publicise the pollution figures for the beaches in their areas.

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend will recall that the Royal Commission on environmental pollution's 10th report refers to bathing water and, in particular, to the suggestion from the Association of County Councils that the identification and monitoring of bathing waters should be the responsibility of district councils.

The Government expect soon to reply to the report, and it would not be correct for me to anticipate this reply.

Red Squirrels

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the reintroduction of red squirrels to Regent's park; and whether there are any plans to emulate the London zoo red squirrel watch scheme in royal parks.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department welcomes and has fully co-operated with the red squirrel watch scheme in Regent's park. We should await the outcome of the scheme before considering any extension.

Inner City Partnership Funds

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements exist for the monitoring and auditing of the application of inner city partnership funds.

Sir George Young: Urban programme expenditure is local authority expenditure supported by central Government grant. Responsibility for monitoring and auditing lies in the first place with the local authority concerned. Grant claims made by the local authority must be checked within my Department and are then certified by the local authority's independent auditor. My Department in turn has its own internal audit procedures and is subject to scrutiny by the National Audit Office.

In addition, my officials regularly analyse inner area programmes to compare outturn with approved expenditure. At project level, as well as monitoring visits to a sample of projects the Department commissions studies of the effectiveness of projects in particular fields.

Local Government Reform

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what discussions he has had on methods of controlling the expenditure and manpower of joint boards taking on the responsibilities of the passenger transport authorities of the metropolitan county councils in the event of the implementation of Cmnd. 9063; and what were his conclusions;

(2) what discussions he has had on methods of controlling the expenditure and manpower of joint boards taking on the responsibilities of the fire departments of the metropolitan county councils in the event of the implementation of Cmnd. 9063; and what were his conclusions;

(3) what discussions he has had on methods of controlling the expenditure and manpower of joint boards taking on the responsibilities of the police authorities of the metropolitan county councils in the event of the implementation of Cmnd. 9063; and what were his conclusions.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have considered the representations made on this point on response to Cmnd. 9063. My conclusions will be incorporated in the Bill to be published shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the monetary value of services to be transferred directly to London borough control in the event of the dissolution of the Greater London council.

Mr. Waldegrave: Of the GLC's 1984-85 budgeted rate fund net current expenditure, it is estimated that about £380 million-£400 million relates to services which are to be transferred to London boroughs direct. Another £127 million will fall to the borough-controlled London Fire Board.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out in detail how the information about concert hall bookings on the South Bank requested in his letter to the director general to the Greater London council of 7 November will facilitate the formulation and, in the event of their being approved by Parliament, the implementation of proposals for the abolution of the Greater London council.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government intend to propose that, if Parliament agrees, responsibility for the South Bank arts complex will be transferred to the Arts Council. The information requested will facilitate a continuing concert programme on the South Bank after 1 April 1986.

Minerals Planning

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of Stae for the Environment if he will list the metropolitan district councils which will not be required to undertake minerals planning in the event of the implementation of Cmnd. 9063.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Planning application for minerals will need to be considered by those authorities to which they are submitted. More generally, the wider aspects of minerals planning will need to be considered by metropolitan districts in preparing their unitary development plans.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many minerals planning applications have been determined since 1974 by each of the metropolitan county councils, listed by district council area.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I understand that between April 1974 and March 1984 decisions were taken on 440 minerals planning applications within the areas of metropolitan county councils. I regret that more detailed information cannot be provided except at disproportionate cost.

Rates (Railways)

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek to amend the General Rating Act 1967 to provide the same exemption for privately run non-profit making railways as applies to rail services in the public sector.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. We included provisions in the Rates Act 1984 which will enable us to bring the British Railways Board, London Regional Transport and British Waterways Board into rating by means of statutory formulae. Meanwhile, these boards continue to make payments in lieu of rates, as required by section 32 of the General Rate Act 1967.

Falkland Islands

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many Falkland islanders are employed by his Department in the Falkland Islands; in what capacity; and how rates of pay compare with the equivalent grade of British personnel with whom they are working.

Sir George Young: None.

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if there are administrative instructions that prevent any Falkland islander from being employed in projects such as the installation at Mount Pleasant airport; what is the total work force on that project; how many are islanders; what rates of pay are current; and if islanders are paid at the same rate as non-islanders.

Sir George Young: There are no instructions preventing the employment of Falkland islanders on PSA work at Mount Pleasant or elsewhere. However, the Falkland Islands Government have made it clear that the local labour force is so limited that any significant recruitment by PSA contractors could cripple Government services. PSA has therefore instructed its contractors to consult with the Falkland Islands Government before recruiting local workers. At present the Laing-Mowlem-Amey Roadstone Construction joint venture is employing one Falkland islander on the Mount Pleasant airfield project. There are currently 1,724 other contractors' employees engaged on the project. In accordance with UK Government policy, these workers have been recruited in the United Kingdom. Rates of pay are a matter between the contractor and his employees. The rates reflect the particular duties involved and, in the case of the United Kingdom employees, the discomforts and inconvenience of working 8,000 miles from home.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if it is his intention in the forthcoming rate support grant settlement to pay regard to those shire counties which are experiencing difficulties with regard to the provision of books and similar equipment in schools.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend will consider all the representations he has received about the 1985-86 rate support grant settlement before taking final decisions.

EMPLOYMENT

South Yorkshire

40. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of persons unemployed in the county of South Yorkshire; and how many of these are young people who have never experienced normal employment.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 October the number of unemployed claimants in South Yorkshire was 96,269. In the area covered by the South Yorkshire jobcentres there were 7,393 unemployed school leavers under 18 years of age.

Wages Council Workers (Knowsley)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take steps to ensure that all those workers in Knowsley covered by wages councils are aware of their legal entitlements.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A copy of the appropriate wages order is sent to all employers known to employ workers covered by wages councils. Employers are required by law to display the wages order where it can be seen by their workers. These arrangements have applied since the inception of wages council legislation and are considered adequate.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many (a) firms and (b) workers in the area of the metropolitan borough of Knowsley are covered by wage councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Statistics for the number of establishments covered by wages councils are not collected for areas smaller than Wages Inspectorate divisions. National estimates only are made for the number of workers covered by wages councils.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many wage council establishments in Knowsley were found to be underpaying in the last year; how many workers were involved; and what was the amount of arrears paid and the number of prosecutions.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Statistics are not collected for geographical areas smaller than Wages Inspectorate divisions. In 1983, 865 establishments inspected in the north west (west) division of the Wages Inspectorate were found to have underpaid 1,945 workers. Arrears totalling £138,860 were paid. No employers in Knowsley were prosecuted last year for offences under the Wages Councils Act 1979.

Vital Skills Agency

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if Her Majesty's Government will seek to establish a vital skills agency.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government welcome proposals for the better co-ordination of the efforts of existing bodies in this field, but believe that action should be initiated by industry itself. Further consideration is being given to the proposal to establish a vital skills agency in the context of the current review of future manpower needs in the information technology field.

Training Information Framework

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the training information framework.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The training information framework is a system which is being developed by the Manpower Services Commission to hold detailed information on employment and training provision at local level.

A pilot scheme will operate at nine locations starting in late 1985. When this has been fully evaluated, we will consider the costs and benefits of extending the system.

Community Programme (Adult Training)

Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps the Government are taking to introduce an adult training element into the community programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder) on 30 July, at column 122, my right hon. Friend announced the Government's decision that, as part of the adult training strategy, participation in the community programme should be linked with short courses of work preparation and basic skills training. The Manpower Services Commission has begun to set up such courses and we expect some 50,000 community programme clients a year to benefit when the arrangements are fully developed.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps the Government are taking to increase the number of jobs in manufacturing industry in the north-west region.

Mr. Alan Clark: The White Paper "Regional Industrial Development" (Cmnd. 9111) published last December made it clear that the Government are committed to maintaining an effective regional policy and to ensuring that it is economic and effective in creating genuine jobs. An announcement on the current regional policy review will be made shortly.

Sustainable employment ultimately depends however on a healthy economy and competitive industry. Our policies are directed to this end and we continue to look for ways of building on what has been achieved so far. One important effect on firms' competitiveness is the level of wages and the Government believe that moderating the growth in real earnings will have a significant impact on employment levels in manufacturing and other industries in the north-west, and elsewhere.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Employment what were the numbers employed in manufacturing industry in Britain in 1970, 1976, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following table gives the numbers of employees in employment in manufacturing industries in Great Britain in June of each of the years specified. The June 1970 figures are based on the 1968 Standard Industrial Classification and those for the later years are based on the 1980 SIC. Figures based on the 1980 SIC are not available for dates prior to June 1971.

June	Number
1970	8,164,000
1976	7,131,000
1979	7,113,000
1980	6,804,000
1981	6,100,000
1982	5,803,000
1983	5,539,000

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are currently in youth training schemes operating in Lambeth.

Mr. Peter Morrison: There were 926 young people in training on youth training schemes in the borough of Lambeth at the end of October.

Merseyside

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of people covered by Her Majesty's Government's special employment and training measures in the county of Merseyside.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Currently, some 28,400, although because of the various bases on which local information is collated an unknown proportion, will be in areas outside the county of Merseyside.

Leeds (Unemployment Statistics)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many people under the age of (a) 18 years and (b) aged 19 to 21 years in the Leeds travel-to-work area were unemployed on the latest available figures;

(2) how many people in the Leeds travel-to-work area under the age of 18 years have been unemployed between (a) six months and 12 months and (b) for more than 12 months on the latest available figures;

(3) how many people unemployed in the Leeds travel-to-work area have been unemployed for (a) between six months and 12 months, (b) between 12 months and 24 months and (c) more than 24 months on the latest available figures.

Mr. Alan Clark: Information for the new travel-to-work areas on the age of claimants unemployed and their duration of unemployment will become available next year. Data for the old Leeds travel-to-work area in respect of unemployed claimants aged 16, 17, 18, 19 and 20 to 24 years are available in the House of Commons Library.

Job-splitting Scheme

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many applications have been approved since the start of the job-splitting scheme; how many are in respect of males and females; what public funds have been spent on advertising the scheme and otherwise promoting it; and how many employer inquiries have been received.

Mr. Alan Clark: Nine hundred and sixty-nine applications involving 428 men and 1,510 women in part-time job opportunities had been approved under the scheme at the end of September, 1984. The total cost of publicising the scheme including leaflets, posters and press advertising has been £423,208. No specific records are kept of day-to-day inquiries, but advertising campaigns in January to March 1983 and March 1984 generated over 11,000 requests for further information about the scheme, mainly from employers.

Glasgow Redundancy Payments Office

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement regarding the future of the Glasgow redundancy payments office, indicating what proportion of the work on redundancy, insolvency and maternity payments done in Scotland is undertaken by the Glasgow office, the number of inquiries made at the public counter in 1983 and what efforts have been made to obtain more suitable alternative accommodation in Glasgow.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department is planning to close the Glasgow redundancy payments officer by the end of March 1985. The decision was taken following a review of the staffing needs and effective organisation of redundancy payments work. Increased efficiency together with a steady decline in work volumes means that Scotland can now be served by a single office in one location. With the lease on the Glasgow office due to expire at the end of March 1985, the decision was made to centralise all Scotland's redundancy payments work on the Edinburgh redundancy payments office, primarily because the same building also houses essential support services and the Department's senior line management responsible for redundancy work.

In the year ended 30 September 1984, the Glasgow office handled 59 per cent. of Scotland's redundancy work, 69 per cent. of insolvency work and 47 per cent. of maternity work. It also dealt with some 3,050 personal callers. Although Glasgow deals with more personal inquiries than Edinburgh, the overwhelming majority of RPO work is conducted by post or telephone.

London Borough of Brent

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what proportion of all employees in the London borough of Brent is employed in an establishment whose final owner is registered overseas, according to the latest information available to him; and if he will supply comparative information for each of the years 1954, 1960 and 1970 or the nearest available to each of these dates;

(2) what information he has as to the proportion of all employees in the London borough of Brent employed in an establishment whose final owner undertakes more than 20 per cent. of his total manufacturing production overseas; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing comparisons for each of the years 1954, 1960 and 1970.

Mr. Alan Clark: I regret that information of this nature is not collected by the Department.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were employed in the London borough of Brent in each standard industrial classification according to the latest annual census of employment; if he will break down the figures by full-time and part-time and male and female; and what are the comparative figures for the same geographical area for 1954, 1960 and 1970, or the nearest available date.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information is as follows. The figures relate to the area covered by the Kilburn, Wembley and Willesden jobcentre areas which corresponds closely to the London borough of Brent.

Source: Census of employment. Results of the 1981 census were compiled on the basis of the Standard Industrial Classification Revised 1980 (SIC 80) and subsequently converted to SIC 1968 for comparability. Figures are not available on a consistent basis prior to 1971.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were employed in the London borough of Brent in establishments of the following sizes, according to the latest annual census of employment: (a) establishments of 20 or fewer employees, (b) establishments of 21 to 100 employees, (c) establishments of 101 to 500 employees, (d) establishments of 501 to 1,000 employees, (e) establishments of 1,001 to 10,000 employees and (f) establishments of 10,001 or more employees; how many establishments fell into each of these size ranges; and if he will supply comparative information for each of the years 1954, 1960 and 1970, or the nearest available to each of these dates.

Mr. Alan Clark: I regret that size analyses from the census of employment are not available for areas smaller than regions.

Area Manpower Boards

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take steps to increase minority representation on area manpower boards.

Mr. Peter Morrison [pursuant to his reply, 12 November 1984, c. 100]: No, but a review of area manpower boards is due to take place before the end of next year and this will cover issues relating to the composition of boards.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Deaf and Partially Hearing Children

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many (i) deaf and (ii) partially hearing children have been educated in (a) ordinary schools and units and (b) special schools in each education authority area in each of the last five years; and which authorities make no use of special schools for such pupils.

Mr. Dunn: The number of deaf children and those with partial hearing in special schools and ordinary schools in each local education authority in January 1983 is shown in the following table. Corresponding figures for the four previous years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Teacher Training

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to reach conclusions about the recommendations in the report of the Advisory Committee on the Supply and Education of Teachers on teacher training and special education needs.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales are considering the recommendations of the report and will announce their decisions in due course.

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which organisations have been sent copies of the consultative document issued by his Department in October about the recent report on teacher training and special education needs.

Mr. Dunn: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to the consultative document "Special School Provision for Hearing Impaired Children" which my right hon. Friend issued in October. Views on the document have been invited from the following organisations:

Regional Conferences on Special Education
LEAs maintaining special schools for the hearing impaired
Non-maintained special schools for the hearing impaired
Independent schools for the hearing impaired
Association of County Councils
Associations of Metropolitan Authorities

Voluntary Organisations (Grants)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what grants have been made and, if applicable, under which schemes, to national voluntary youth organisations over each of the last 10 years; and what provisions have been made for grants to these and similar organisations for 1985.

Mr. Brooke: Grants made by this Department since the financial year 1975-76 towards the headquarters expenditure of national voluntary youth organisations are as follows. Until April 1983 these grants were made under regulation 29 of the Further Education Regulations 1975, and since April 1983 under regulation 20(1) (6) of the Education (Grant) Regulations 1983. Grants for 1985-86 will be announced next year.

Medical Research Council

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what matters concerning the financial position of the Medical Research Council were discussed at his recent meeting with the chairman of the council; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received from the Medical Research Council about the adequacy of current financial provision for the council; what response he is making; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: At the meeting in July, the chairman of the Medical Research Council explained the council's difficulties, the measures it had taken to remain within its cash limit, and their implications. My right hon. Friend took note but was unable to respond at the time to the chairman's request for additional funds, as the 1984 public expenditure survey was still in progress.

My right hon. Friend announced yesterday that the science budget in 1985-86 will be £587 million. This represents an increase of £14 million over previously announced planning figures. He awaits the advice of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils on the distribution of the money between the bodies funded by the science budget, of which the Medical Research Council is one.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Nationality

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will conduct an inquiry into the working of the British Nationality Act and the immigration rules.

Mr. Waddington: The working of the British Nationality Act 1981 and the immigration rules is kept under constant review. We see no need for an inquiry.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the latest number of arrests resulting from incidents arising out of the miners' dispute; and in what categories charges have been made.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Between 13 March and 8 November inclusive 7,658 arrests have been made in connection with the miners' dispute. Up to and including 6 November charges had been brought for the following offences:

Offence	Number
Section 5 of the Public Order Act 1936	3,264
Obstruction of the police	1,525
Obstruction of the highway	582
Criminal damage	724

Resisting arrest	17
Possession of an offensive weapon	38
Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act—Besetting	226
Burglary	17
Handling stolen property	1
Drug offence	1
Breach of the peace	117
Breach of bail conditions	28
Attempt (various offences)	17
Drunkenness	56
Unlawful assembly	507
Railway offences	17
Affray	21
Riot	137
Incitement	1
Reckless driving	14
Threats/conspiracy to cause damage	12
Explosives offence	3
Threats to kill	3
Unlawful imprisonment	2
Other offences	123
Total charges	8,194

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total financial cost to Lancashire county council for police operations in connection with the miners' strike; and how much assistance he has given to cover the cost of those operations.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that the Lancashire police authority had incurred additional expenditure of £1·114 million on policing the miners' dispute in the county up to 30 September. This expenditure qualifies for normal police grant at 50 per cent. and the authority has sought and received an advance of grant of £543,000 from the Department. The Lancashire police have also incurred costs in providing assistance to other forces but these costs will be reclaimed by the Lancashire police authority from the authorities for those forces.

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many criminal charges against those who are alleged to have intimidated working miners have been entered since the inception of the coal industry dispute; and, of the total, how many cases have been tried;

(2) of the 7,914 charges made since the commencement of the coal industry dispute, how many have been tried to date; and, of those involving in some way alleged intimidating working miners, how many cases have actually been heard.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Between 13 March and 6 November, 6,356 people were charged with a total of 8,194 offences in connection with the miners' dispute. Two thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight of these cases had been completed by 6 November. The figures available centrally do not distinguish between offences committed against working miners and those committed against others. Nor is it possible from these figures to determine which of the charges have been brought for incidents of intimidation. That information could be obtained only at disproportionate expense.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in which category of the wanted and missing persons' index of the police national computer names of miners not suspected of any crime but involved in picketing have been placed.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I am making inquiries to establish whether the position has changed since August when the hon. Member was informed that there had been no such cases.

Prison Department and Treasury (Manpower Reviews)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the reports of the joint manpower reviews carried out by the Prison Department and the Treasury and produced in August 1982 and June 1983, or alternatively place copies in the Library.

Mr. Mellor: The reports produced as a result of the work of the joint manpower review are internal management documents which have assisted the Government in assessing the manpower requirements of the prison service in the course of recent annual public expenditure surveys. We have no plans to publish the reports.

Women in Custody

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women currently on remand in custody awaiting trial or sentence have their children with them; and what are the offences with which they have been charged.

Mr. Mellor: None.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women gave birth while on remand in custody awaiting trial or sentence in 1983 and so far in 1984; what was the offence with which each one was charged; and what was the sentence.

Mr. Mellor: Fourteen unsentenced women gave birth whilst in custody between 1 January 1983 and 7 November 1984. Of the 13 for whom information about the outcome of court proceedings is available, the following table sets out the main offence for which each was charged and the outcome.

Main Offence	Outcome of trial
Arson	Hospital Order
Theft	2½ years' imprisonment
Robbery	3 years' youth custody

Main Offence	Outcome of trial
Drugs	18 months' youth custody
Handling of stolen goods	12 months' youth custody
Burglary	Probation
Drugs	Acquitted
Drugs	555 days' imprisonment
Drugs	18 months' imprisonment
Deception	Hospital Order
Manslaughter	Acquitted
Soliciting	Fine
Murder	Life imprisonment

Prisoners (Medical Records)

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will outline the facilities available for the transfer of medical records from the community to prison medical staff in the case of prisoners (a) held on remand and (b) held awaiting final placement.

Mr. Mellor: There are arrangements for the NHS records of prisoners sentenced to more than two years' imprisonment to be sent to the prison concerned as soon as possible. In addition, every prisoner is examined by a medical officer when first received, and if it appears that he was under treatment before he entered custody the medical officer may if he thinks it necessary write to the doctor or hospital concerned to obtain further information.

Fire Brigades (Asbestos)

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he will encourage the fire brigades of local authorities to carry asbestos detectors on all occasions;

(2) whether he will issue guidance to fire brigades encouraging them to undertake comprehensive reviews of their procedures regarding asbestos contamination with respect to notifying the relevant local authority when asbestos contamination occurs following a fire.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is for fire authorities to acquire appropriate equipment and liaison arrangements are best determined locally in the light of particular circumstances; but the Department has issued guidance to fire authorities on the dangers from asbestos and how to minimise them. This guidance is kept under review and, as my right hon. and learned Friend has already announced, our officials will be discussing with all the relevant interests how it could best be supplemented following the hazards that arose from a recent fire in Cricklewood.

Immigrants (Bail)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many of those released on bail pending the hearing of an appeal under the Immigration Act 1971 during 1983 then absconded;

(2) how many of those detained as the subject of a deportation order and then granted temporary release during 1983 then absconded.

Mr. Waddington: I regret that this information is not available.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of those treated as illegal entrants and granted temporary admission during 1983 then absconded.

Mr. Waddington: Seventeen absconded after being granted temporary release.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of those granted temporary admission at ports of entry during 1983 then absconded.

Mr. Waddington: Of the 7,292 persons who were given temporary admission to the United Kingdom at ports of entry in 1983, 137 absconded.

Civil Defence Budget

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the total civil defence budget for 1984-85 is expected to be; how much of this will be grant-aid to local authorities; and what would be the additional costs of making all local authority emergency planning staff salaries 100 per cent. grant-aided for that year.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The total civil defence budget included in the Supply Estimates for 1984-85 is £69·7 million. Of this, £11·1 million is for civil defence grant to local authorities. In these Estimates, provision for local authority planning staff was approximately £5·8 million. The additional cost of making provision for the salaries of all local authority emergency planning staff (currently grant-aided at 75 per cent.) eligible for grant at the rate of 100 per cent. would be about £1·9 million.

NATO (Civil Defence)

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what subjects the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation civil defence committee is currently considering; and whether it has done any work on the protection of the civil population in a nuclear, biological and chemical environment.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The civil defence committee of NATO is developing guidelines on a wide range of civil defence matters, among them methods for the protection of the civil population against the effects of modern weapons.

Charity Funds

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to introduce legislation to improve administration of charity funds, or to make fund trustees more accountable to the public.

Mr. Mellor: Not at present.

Prevention of Terrorism (Landing Cards)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether any members of the European Parliament travelling from the Republic of Ireland into the United Kingdom on Monday 29 October refused to complete the landing cards issued under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1976 on their arrival at Heathrow airport; and if he will make a statement;

(2) by what authority he has sought to excuse Members of the European Assembly from completing landing and embarkation cards issued under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1976 (a) during their journeys within the United Kingdom between Great Britain and Northern Ireland and (b) between any part of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brittan: I understand that two members of the European Parliament travelling from the Republic of Ireland to Brussels via Heathrow airport on 29 October who had at first been asked to complete landing cards were allowed to proceed without doing so when they satisfied the examining officer by other means of their identities. The use of these cards is discretionary under the Prevention of Terrorism (Supplemental Temporary Provisions) Order 1984, and the decision lies with the examining officer.

BBC (Advertising)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government will now give consideration to the introduction of advertising to fund the British Broadcasting Corporation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Under the terms of the current television licence fee settlement the fees are to remain at their present levels until the end of next March. Discussions are likely to begin with the BBC shortly about the level of fees after that. I do not envisage that those discussions will include the possibility of funding the BBC by advertising.

Vermin Control (Firearms)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what restrictions he imposes on access to approved ranges for farmers and others who hold firearms certificates for vermin control.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The question of what conditions, if any, should be attached to a firearm certificate is one for the chief officer of police to decide according to the circumstances of each case.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek powers to permit all firearms certificate holders for vermin control the authority periodically to check and when necessary to adjust the zero of their rifles, including those rifles which are considered to have fixed sights.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Chief officers of police already have power to include such provision on firearm certificates. My right hon. and learned Friend is considering what advice on zeroing should be included in the memorandum of guidance.

Channel Islands and Isle of Man

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what administrative responsibilities he has for (a) the Channel Islands and (b) the Isle of Man.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The islands are internally self-governing dependencies of the Crown. The United Kingdom Government are directly responsible for their external relations and defence. The Crown acts through the Privy Council. My right hon. and learned Friend is the Privy Councillor with primary responsibility for matters relating to the islands. He acts as the channel of communication between the islands and the United Kingdom Government, and submits advice as appropriate, with respect principally to proposals for legislation (which require Royal Assent) and Crown appointments.

Firearms Act 1968 (Working Party)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the police members of his recent working party on the administration of the Firearms Act 1968 hold for personal use (a) a current shotgun certificate, firearms certificate or firearms dealers' certificates, respectively and (b) have ever held any of the foregoing.

Mr. Giles Shaw: One of the police members of the working party holds a shotgun certificate and two others have done so in the past; one holds a firearms certificate; and none holds or has ever held, a firearms dealers' certificate. All of the police representatives had had police firearms training.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the report of the working party into the administration of the Firearms Act 1968, dated April 1984; and which sections he is considering for incorporation into the revision of the memorandum of guidance to the police on the administration of the 1968 Act.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend has asked chief constables to adapt their procedures so that they conform with the working party's recommendations. All the recommendations will be reflected in the revised memorandum.

Car Radio (Licence Fee)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received representations from the British Broadcasting Corporation suggesting that there should be introduced a licence fee in respect of car radios; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes. While my right hon. and learned Friend is prepared to consider constructive suggestions for changes in the broadcast receiving licence system, he has informed the BBC that he does not think, on balance, that there would be advantage in reintroducing car radio licences.

Local Radio

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received representations from the Independent Broadcasting Authority suggesting that some diversification of the activities of local radio companies be permitted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No such representations have been received, but the Independent Broadcasting Authority announced on 12 November as part of a package of measures to strengthen the financial foundations of independent local radio, that the authority would in future be placing a stronger requirement on ILR companies to take responsibility for their own affairs, particularly as regards diversification of activities.

Senior Citizens (Television Licences)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to introduce concessionary television licences for senior citizens; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Concessionary licences for all pensioners would cause a very substantial reduction in the licence revenue, which would have to be made up by other licence holders. They would also be unfair on others who, though not pensioners, were in similar financial circumstances. We therefore have no plans to introduce concessionary licences for pensioners generally.

Police National Computer

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will describe the data fields of the crime pattern analysis application of the police national computer and which data fields can be used to retrieve data.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The data fields consist of details of the offence, its location and date, modus operandi, any property stolen, descriptions of suspects or vehicles and a free text section for any additional information. Data can be retrieved from all the data fields.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will describe the data fields of the vehicle owners' index of the police national computer and which data fields can be used to retrieve data.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The data fields consist of the vehicle registration mark, date of first registration, descriptive details of the vehicle, date of last change of keeper, name and address of the current keeper and indicators which provide additional information of use to the police. Records may be retrieved at any terminal by the vehicle registration mark. If specially requested, searches may also be conducted using descriptive details or the post code.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will describe the data fields of the stolen and suspect vehicle index of the police national computer and which data fields can be used to retrieve data.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The data fields consist of the vehicle registration mark, descriptive details of the vehicle, the date and nature of the report, for example that the vehicle has been lost, found, and so on, and a code identifying the police station from which the entry originated. Records may be retrieved at any terminal by the vehicle registration mark. If specially requested, searches may also be conducted using descriptive details or information from any of the other data fields.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will describe the data fields of the criminal names index of the police national computer and which data fields can be used to retrieve data.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The data fields consist of the subject's name and any alias, date and place of birth, Criminal Record Office number and other references, descriptive details, any extra information of which a police officer should be aware, the date of the incident which led to the creation of the record, and the date and time of the last amendment to the record. Records may be retrieved by name together with other optional search factors (date of birth, sex, colour and height), or by the Criminal Record Office number.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will describe the data fields of the proposed criminal records index of the police national computer and which data fields can be used to retrieve data.

Mr. Giles Shaw: On present plans, the data fields of this application, which will cover both convictions and impending prosecutions, will consist of the following: all entries will include a Criminal Record Office reference number, local references and indications as to whether fingerprints and photographs are held. Data fields relating to convictions will also contain details of "recordable" offences of which the subject was convicted; the court; date of court appearance; sentence(s), and the number of other offences taken into consideration. Data fields relating to impending prosecutions will also contain details of the court; proposed date of the court appearance, and the date on which the subject was charged. Records will be capable of being retrieved either by name and other descriptive details or by the Criminal Record Office reference number.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will describe the data fields of the wanted and missing persons' index of the police national computer and which data fields can be used to retrieve data.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The data fields consist of the subject's name and any alias, descriptive details, any extra information of which a police officer should be aware, Criminal Record Office number and other references, the nature of the entry, for example that the subject is wanted for specific offences, sought for desertion from the armed forces, and so on, details of any offence, the relevant powers of arrest, the date of the incident, the date on which it was reported, the date on which it was entered on the file, and the earliest date on which the case will automatically be removed from the file, together with any additional information which may be relevant. Records may be retrieved by using reference numbers, or by name and descriptive details, or by the type of entry or offence.

Firearms Certificates (Rifles)

Mr. Ron Davis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in his guidance to chief constables relating to firearms certificates, he will include definitions of those rifle sights requiring adjustment for zero and fixed sights; and if he will give a general indication of the type of rifle and its use for which each would be suited.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question from him on 9 November, at column 21.

Breathalyser Machine

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all makes and types of breathalyser in use in the United Kingdom (a) now and (b) since the inception of breathalyser tests, showing hand-held machines separately.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Since the inception in 1968 of breath testing as a means of detecting alcohol in the body of a motorist the following road side breath screening devices (hand held) have been, and remain, approved for use by police forces in England and Wales:

Device	Type	First approval
Alcotest 80	Bag and tube filled with reactive crystals	1968
Alcotest 80A	Bag and tube filled with reactive crystals	1975
Alcolyser	Bag and tube filled with reactive crystals	1979
Alcolmeter	Electronic	1979
Alert	Electronic	1980

The following evidential breath testing instruments have been approved for use by police in England and Wales from 6 May 1983:

The Camic Simulator and Camic Breath Analyser
The Lion Breath Simulator and Lion Intoximeter 3000.

Instruments for use in Scotland and Northern Ireland are a matter for my right hon. Friends the respective Secretaries of State.

Plastic Baton Rounds

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from the chief constables of the 12 police areas currently holding stocks of plastic baton rounds as to the number and nature of training courses run in their areas in the use of plastic baton rounds; and how many officers have received such training since 1 January.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall write to the hon. Member.

SCOTLAND

Nuclear Winter

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland why he has refused a request for scientists from the Scottish Office to attend conferences on nuclear winter theory.

Mr. Ancram: The Department was invited by Glasgow district council, in conjunction with Strathclyde regional council, to participate in a conference the brochure for which gave prominence to the so-called "nuclear winter" and expressed a hope "that it may be possible to break through the conspiracy of silence".

As the Government have made no secret of known facts about the effects of nuclear weapons, and as the "nuclear winter" is an unproved hypothesis, the invitation was declined because it was apparent that the conference was unlikely to provide objective or dispassionate treatment of the subject matter.

Young Persons (Remand)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) boys and (b) girls were held on remand in custody in penal establishments in the last year for which figures are available who were (i) acquitted and (ii) given non-custodial sentences; and what was the average length of time that these were on remand in custody.

Mr. Ancram: Of the 147 children who were held on remand in penal establishments in 1983, 47 were committed by the court to a period of residential training, and five were sentenced to detention. Each of these disposals leads to detention in a place and on such conditions as the Secretary of State directs. In all but a very small minority of cases the place directed by the Secretary of State is a list D school.

No information is held centrally which indicates how many of the remaining 95 children held on remand in a penal establishment were acquitted, were given non-custodial disposals by the court, or were referred to a children's hearing for disposal.

The average period spent in custody on remand in a penal establishment was 26 days.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) boys and (b) girls aged under 17 years were held on remand in penal establishments in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Ancram: Separate figures for young offenders aged 16 are not available. The numbers of children aged under 16 held on remand in penal establishments during 1983 was:

	Numbers
Boys	141
Girls	6

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number, by age, sex and location, of juveniles on remand in custody in penal establishments at the latest date for which figures are available; and what were the offences with which they were charged and the length of time on remand.

Mr. Ancram: On 30 October 1984, 11 boys aged 15 and no girls were held on remand in Scottish penal establishments. The charges on which they were held and the time spent in custody on that date were as follows:

Nature of charges	Time in custody
1. Theft by housebreaking	1 day
2. Assault and robbery	6 days
3. Theft by housebreaking	16 days
4. Civic Government Act, Bail Act	29 days
5. Theft, Road Traffic Act offences	37 days
6. Assault to severe injury, attempting to defeat the ends of justice	44 days
7. Civic Government Act, Bail Act	29 days
8. Theft, Road Traffic Act offences	8 days
9. Attempted murder, assault to severe injury	2 days
10. Assault to severe injury	2 days
11. Assault and robbery, theft	24 days

Ten of the boys were held in Longriggend remand institution and the other was held in Edinburgh prison.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the remand of juveniles to adult penal establishments.

Mr. Ancram: For sentencing purposes in Scotland, a distinction is made between young offenders from 16 to 20 years of age inclusive and children under 16 years of age: "juveniles" is not a legal term.

Young offenders who are remanded in custody are initially remanded in all cases to an adult penal establishment. In the great majority of cases, however, they are quickly moved on to an under-21 remand institution. Children who are remanded in custody are normally located in secure accommodation provided by local authorities, but where a court certifies that a child over 14 years of age is unruly or depraved the child is remanded to a penal establishment.

It is a requirement of the prison rules that remand inmates are, as far as possible, kept apart from convicted inmates; and as far as possible children remanded in a penal establishment are kept apart from other inmates on remand.

Health Services

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the percentage increase in spending in real terms on hospital and community health services since 1979-80.

Mr. John MacKay: Detailed records of expenditure at constant prices are no longer maintained. Gross recurrent expenditure on hospital and community health services has risen from £737 million in 1979-80 to an estimated £1,291 million in 1984-85 and this has enabled services to expand by about 5 per cent.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage change he estimates changes in population structure and advances in medical technology since 1979-80 will have on the level of spending on hospital and community health services.

Mr. John MacKay: Over the period from 1979-80 to 1984-85 the cost of meeting demand from demographic changes and advances in medical technology has been estimated at around 1 per cent. of hospital and community health services expenditure in each year.

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the percentage increase in real input volume expenditure in National Health Service spending since 1979-80.

Mr. John MacKay: Detailed records of programme expenditure in volume terms are no long maintained. Gross expenditure on the National Health Service in Scotland has risen from £1,053 million in 1979-80 to an estimated 1,905 million in 1984-85. This has been sufficient to enable services to expand by about 7 per cent. overall.

Nuclear Bunker, Coupar Angus

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the proposed number of personnel to be accommodated in the nuclear bunker being constructed by Tayside regional council at Coupar Angus.

Mr. Ancram: As I explained in my reply to the hon. Member on 23 October 1984, at column 549-50, Tayside regional council does not propose to provide a "nuclear bunker".

The staffing of the proposed emergency centre, on which construction has not begun, is a matter for the regional council.

Higher Education

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information his Department has from the 1981 census on age participation rates by social class for higher education in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested is not available from the 1981 census. However, the following figures from the 1983 Scottish School Leavers Survey show for each social class the percentage of school leavers from session 1981-82 who entered higher education in the following session:

Social Class	Per cent.
I	46·2
II	31·8
III Non-manual	20·4
III Manual	10·4
IV	8·1
V	3·3

Source: 1983 Scottish School Levers Survey.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information his Department has on the number and percentage of unemployed in Scotland by social class from the 1981 census.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested is as follows:

1981 census—Scotland
Economically active usually resident population by social class

Social Class	Economically Active	Out of employment
	(a)	Number (b)	Percentage (c)
I Professional etc. occupations	82,790	1,760	2·1
II Intermediate occupations	452,480	15,710	3·5
III (N) Skilled occupations—non-manual	491,600	24,350	5·0
III (M) Skilled occupations—manual	606,770	68,280	11·3
IV Partly skilled occupations	452,540	55,040	12·2
V Unskilled occupations	185,350	36,080	19·5
Persons inadequately described, persons with no previous job and Armed Forces	129,820	93,940	72·4
Total	2,401,350	295,160	12·3

Notes:
(1) The economically active include persons in employment (that is in a job at any time in the week before the census) and persons out of employment (that is those who in the week before the census were either seeking work, prevented by temporary sickness from seeking work, or waiting to take up a job already accepted.
(2) Social class is based on occupation for those persons in employment and on the last full-time occupation (if any) for persons out of employment.
(3) Figures in columns (a) and (b) have been grossed-up from a 10 per cent. sample.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information his Department possesses on the number and percentage of unemployed in Dundee by social class from the 1981 census.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available in the form requested.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many young people (a) under the age of 18 years and (b) under the age of 21 years, in Dundee, have never been in full-time employment since leaving school.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I regret the information is not available in the precise form requested. Figures for young people who have not been in employment since leaving school are compiled for the age bands up to 18, 18 and 19 and over and are available in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report an analysis by duration of unemployment, by number and by percentage, at the latest available date for Dundee, in respect of the following groups: (a) up to six months, (b) over six months, up to one year, (c) over one year and up to two years, (d) over two years and up to three years and (e) three years and over; and if he will give comparable figures for Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's letter to him of 22 October. The information requested is available in the House of Commons Library.

Geriatrics and Geriatric Psychiatry

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current number of consultants in geriatrics and geriatric psychiatry in the Tayside health board area; what were the figures in 1980; and how many vacancies currently exist.

Mr. John MacKay: At 30 September 1983 there were six (whole-time equivalent) consultants in geriatric medicine in the Tayside health board area. The comparable figure for 1980 was five. Geriatric psychiatry is not a separate specialty, but some consultants in general psychiatry spend a major part of their time providing psycho-geriatric services. Consultants in general medicine also undertake the care and treatment of geriatric patients. My Department has not been notified of any existing long-term vacancies in geriatrics, general medicine or psychiatry in the Tayside area.

Radiographers and Physiotherapists

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the number of radiographers and physiotherapists employed by the Tayside health board in each of the past three years.

Mr. John MacKay: The information requested is as follows:

Year;*	Radiographers†	Physiotherapists†
1981	90	75
1982	88	72
1983	92	72

* As at 30 September.
† Whole-time equivalents.

Nurses

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current number of nurses in geriatrics and psychogeriatrics in the Tayside health board area; what were the corresponding figures for 1980; and how many vacancies currently exist.

Mr. John MacKay: At 8 November 1984, 1,513 nursing staff (whole-time equivalent) were employed in geriatric and psycho-geriatric hospitals and wards in the Tayside health board area. The corresponding figure in 1980 was 1,434.

Geriatric and psycho-geriatric patients are nursed also in general beds in general and teaching hospitals and others are cared for in the community but the number of nursing staff involved cannot be identified separately.

There were 17 nursing staff vacancies at 8 November 1984 in geriatrics and psycho-geriatrics.

Roads

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for the years 1982, 1983 and 1984 the number of kilometres of (a) trunk motorways, (b) other trunk roads, (c) local authority motorways, (d) other principal roads and (e) other roads.

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

	1 April 1982 Kms.	1 April 1983 Kms.	1 April 1984 Kms.
Trunk motorways	212	212	212
Other trunk roads	2,909	2,909	2,915
Local authority motorways	24	24	24
Other principal roads	7,565	7,579	7,607
Other roads	38,986	39,578	39,750

Redundancies

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number of notified redundancies in Dundee in (a) 1982, (b) 1983 and (c) 1984 to date.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There are no comprehensive statistics held on redundancies. The following table shows the number of redundancies affecting 10 or more people notified to the Manpower Services Commission in the Dundee jobcentre area during the period 1 January 1982 to 31 October 1984.

	Number of redundancies
1982	2,087
1983	4,347
1984 to 31 October	1,356

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many firms in Dundee notified their closure to the Manpower Services Commission in (a) 1982, (b) 1983 and (c) 1984 to date; and, in each year, what was the number of redundancies incurred by the closures.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There are no comprehensive statistics held on redundancies. The following table shows for the Dundee jobcentre area the number of redundancies as a result of closure, and the number of establishments closed, affecting 10 or more workers, as notified to the Manpower Service Commission between 1 January 1982 and 31 October 1984.

	Number of closures	Number of redundancies
1982	12	699
1983	15	625
1984 (to 31 October)	12	344

Crofter Housing

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to raise the level of loan and grant for crofter housing.

Mr. Younger: I have no such plans at present.

Deer (Firearms) (Scotland) Order 1984

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland which organisations he consulted, in accordance with his statutory obligations, before preparing the Deer (Firearms) (Scotland) Order 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The following organisations were consulted during the preparation of the order:

British Deer Society
British Field Sports Society
British Association for Shooting and Conservation
British Deer Farmers' Association
Scottish Venison Dealers' Association
National Game Dealers' Association
Forestry Commission
Scottish Woodland Owners' Association
Institute of Chartered Foresters
Timber Growers United Kingdom
Economic Forestry Group
Fountain Forestry Limited
National Farmers' Union of Scotland
Tilhill Forestry Advisory Service
Society in Scotland for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals
Institute of Terrestrial Ecology
Hill Farming Research Organisation
Rowett Research Institute
Association of Chief Police Officers (Scotland)
Association of Scottish Police Superintendents
Scottish Police Federation
Scottish Landowners' Federation
Crofters Commission
The Guns Review

The consultation documents were also sent to the Gun Trade Association, which approached my Department after a draft of the order was laid before Parliament.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland why he did not consult the Gun Trade Association in connection with the preparation of the Deer (Firearms) (Scotland) Order 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The Gun Trade Association was mistakenly omitted from the original consultation, but after it had approached the Department was sent copies of the consultation documents and invited to discuss any points of difficulty. The association will be included among those initially approached in any future consultation on this subject.

Improvement Repair Grant

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will consider the proposal that local authorities should be enabled to restrict improvement repair grant work to a list of approved value added tax registered contractors who are able to offer a recognised guarantee scheme.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. Friend hopes that one of the results of the Government's current review of grant arrangements will be an extension and improvement of warranty schemes.

Voluntary Bodies (Grants)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the voluntary bodies to which the Scottish Home and Health Department gave grants under section 16B of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978 during 1983-84 and the amount of the grant given in each case.

Mr. Younger: This information is as follows:

	Grant paid 1983-84 £

Scottish Council on Alcoholism	68,000
Family Planning Association	11,160

SOCIAL SERVICES

Hospital Beds

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for what reasons, other than medical, hospital beds are occupied.

Mr. John Patten: In general, patients occupying hospital beds do so because they require medical investigation, treatment or care, including rehabilitation. Local variations in facilities may mean that some patients, particularly elderly people, receive hospital care as an alternative to care in the community. Some patients in long stay hospitals remain there only because there is nowhere else for them to go. The Care in the Community initiative was launched to facilitate their transfer to more appropriate care.

A small number of beds are set aside for the use of relatives or friends where it is in the best interests of patients that they remain close at hand.

Blind Persons

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total number of supplementary benefit claimants receiving the £1·25 weekly addition for blindness in December 1983; and what was the estimated cost of that addition for the preceding 12 months.

Mr. Newton: The final results of the "Annual Statistical Enquiry" for December 1983 are not yet available. Provisional figures suggest that the number of supplementary benefit claimants receiving the £1·25 weekly addition for blindness in December 1983 was about 36,000, at an estimated total cost in the preceding 12 months of about £2·3 million.

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from organisations acting for blind people about a blindness allowance.

Mr. Newton: We have received over 100 representations from hon. and right hon. Members referring to a campaign for a blindness allowance organised by the Royal National Institute for the Blind, the National Federation of the Blind and the National League of the Blind and Disabled. I have agreed to meet with representatives from these organisations today.

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the value of the additional allowance payable to a blind person in receipt of supplementary benefit at September 1984 prices if it had been maintained in real terms at the level of its introduction as a separate allowance in July 1948.

Mr. Newton: The extra allowance for blind people on supplementary benefit was 15 shillings (75 pence) in July 1948. On the basis of the index currently used for up-rating supplementary benefit—that is, the retail price index, less the housing costs component — if it had been maintained in real terms at this level its value at September 1984 prices would be £8·06.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were his reasons for requiring district health authorities to fund a proportion of nationally agreed wage awards by local economies or reductions in services.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Wage awards should normally be regarded as an integral part of the costs of health authorities along with all other costs incurred in providing the service funded from within cash limits. Health authorities have had made available to them this year £85 million growth money. In addition, they have themselves released some £100 million through cost improvement programmes. In these circumstances, we decided that health authorities could reasonably bear a part of the cost over 3 per cent. of recent pay awards although we took a step which we are unlikely to repeat of raising cash limits to meet most of that cost.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make it his policy to maintain the payment of supplementary benefit to teenagers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Financial support for teenagers is within the general remit of both the review of benefits for children and young people, and the review of supplementary benefit, which are currently in progress.

Maternity Allowance

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will now restore the 5 per cent. cut in the maternity allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: When maternity allowance is brought into tax we will consider the restoration of the abatement in the light of the prevailing economic situation.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will now increase the maternity grant to £125 and provide for annual upratings to maintain its value; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The provision of financial help for maternity needs is one of the subjects currently under review.

Disability Benefit

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will now introduce a comprehensive disability benefit paid as of right to those who cannot earn a living due to disability; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have no plans to do so, but, as I explained in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) on 22 October at column 514 we have made useful progress towards our objective of a more coherent system of benefit for disabled people. People who are incapable of work may already qualify for statutory sick pay, sickness benefit, invalidity benefit, non-contributory invalidity pension (to be replaced by severe disablement allowance from 29 November this year) or supplementary benefit.

Severely Handicapped Persons

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of (a) severely handicapped children under the age of 15 years and (b) severely handicapped adults live with their families.

Mr. Newton: This information is not available.

Pensions

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will bring forward proposals to increase the pensions of pensioners on rates lower than the standard rate of pension by a greater cash amount than the proportion which their pension bears to the full rate of pension.

Mr. Newton: Pensioners who receive pensions at less than the full standard rate do so because they have paid less than the required amount of national insurance contributions. To increase such reduced rate pensions by a preferential rate would, therefore, be unfair to those who maintained a full contribution record and would undermine the contributory principle of the scheme.

Pensioners whose retirement pension, together with any other income, is insufficient to meet their requirements can, of course, claim supplementary pension.

Fluoridation

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any warning is given, in areas where water is artificially fluoridated, concerning the possible injurious effects upon health of additional consumption of fluoride tablets or the swallowing of fluoridated toothpaste; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The normal use of fluoride toothpaste in a fluoridated area is not considered to be in any way injurious. "The British National Formulary", which is available to general dental and medical practitioners and pharmacists for the purposes of prescribing under the NHS, contains the advice that

"Fluoride supplements should not be prescribed without prior reference to the fluoride content of the local water supply and are not advisable when the water contains more than 0·7 mg per litre".

The labelling of such supplements when sold over the counter under the supervision of a pharmacist advises that it is unnecessary to take fluoride tablets in areas where water is fluoridated and that purchasers should consult a dental or medical practitioner or pharmacist before administering the preparations.

Single Payments

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the current waiting period for determination of applications for single payments at his Department's office in Pudsey, Leeds 28;

(2) whether he is satisfied with the length of time taken to determine applications for single payments at his Department's office in Pudsey, Leeds 28;

(3) what he is doing to lessen the waiting period for the determination of applications for single payments at his Department's office in Pudsey, Leeds 28.

Mr. Whitney: Claims for single payments are determined as soon as possible after all the information required has been collected. We are satisfied with the special efforts which have been made recently in Pudsey local office to speed up this process. Claims are currently being determined within four weeks of their receipt but many are dealt with sooner.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Young asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many Falkland Islanders are employed by his Department in the Falkland Islands; in what capacity ; and how rates of pay compare with the equivalent grade of British personnel with whom they are working.

Mr. Whitney: None.

Deaf Discrimination

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has now studied the report of the British Deaf Association on deaf discrimination, a copy of which was sent to him; what action he proposes to take; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I have read the report with interest, but do not feel that it shows that anti-discrimination legislation would be a practical or effective way of resolving the problems with which it is concerned. I am however arranging to draw the report's comments on particular points to the attention of appropriate colleagues, and the Government will continue to seek ways of helping to meet the difficulties which deaf people can face.

Free Prescriptions

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of branded medicines obtainable without a prescription which were supplied in 1983-84 under prescription were supplied to people entitled to free prescriptions; and what proportion these prescriptions represented of the £120 million per year he referred to on 8 November, Official Report, column 226.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible with as much relevant information as is available although we will not be able to provide figures broken down in the exact form requested.

Chemists (Reimbursement)

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what changes he intends to make to the method of reimbursing chemists to take account of the advantageous prices now available for some drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The present contract between the Government and retail pharmacists is based on the reimbursement to the pharmacist of the actual cost of the drugs he dispenses. However, for some time now pharmacists have been able to obtain large discounts when they purchase drugs from wholesalers and this enables some pharmacists to make unintended profits, over and above the negotiated profits in the contract, when we reimburse them at manufacturers' list prices. We attempt to deal with this by withholding some of the reimbursement by an amount representing the usual discount which the pharmacist ought to be able to obtain. We assess the usual level of discount prevailing by holding periodic inquiries. This covers the practice of most pharmacists in a fair way. However, some are now obtaining exceptionally high discounts on some drugs and making large unintended profits when they are reimbursed by the NHS for their NHS prescriptions.

Last May I announced new safety controls on imported drugs and referred to these difficulties. I said then that we were considering with everyone concerned how we could modify the reimbursement system to make the arrangements fairer for the taxpayer, the pharmacists and the pharmaceutical industry. We have now decided to introduce new arrangements setting the amount withheld for deemed discounts at two levels, depending on whether drugs used in a prescription were obtained at ordinary or exceptionally high level. In dealing with this new situation, I want to continue to encourage the system to maintain a reasonable level of discounts generally, without allowing those pharmacists who are able to obtain some drugs at very advantageous prices to make very large unintended profits on a limited range of their supplies. The round of consultations is now being completed and I propose to introduce the following modifications, to apply to NHS prescriptions dispensed in England and Wales on and after 1 January 1985. The existing reimbursement arrangements will continue, but in addition the pharmacist will be required to endorse those prescriptions for which he has used a drug obtained from whatever source, at a discount of more than 12 per cent. When those prescriptions are prices at single average rate of discount, 20 per cent. of the current drug tariff price, will be applied to them, and reimbursement will therefore be at 80 per cent. of the drug tariff. These arrangements will apply to all discounts, including extended credit, free goods and discounts for cash. I intend to keep this situation on exceptional discounts under very close review and the rates of threshold and single discount to be introduced initially may be changed, as necessary, in the light of information available on discounts generally. Full details of the revised arrangements will be promulgated to pharmacists, family practitioner committees and the pricing authorities as soon as possible.

Cot Deaths

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence his Department has gathered about the causes of cot deaths; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: There is no evidence to support the view that smothering is the cause of the majority of cot deaths. I deplore any unsubstantiated allegations which might give rise to this impression. Studies point to a variety of factors that may be associated with such deaths, but suggest that there is no single cause. My Department has funded a study on post neonatal mortality, co-ordinated by the medical care research unit at Sheffield University. I expect to receive the report, which will be published, at the end of this month and we shall be considering its findings carefully to see what implications it has both for health service delivery and further research.

Leeds Eastern District Health Authority

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to appoint a new chairman for Leeds eastern district health authority.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 9 November 1984, c. 47]: We expect to announce the appointment of a new chairman for Leeds eastern district health authority soon. I am grateful to Professor Barrett for agreeing to continue to serve as chairman for the time being.

Regional and District Health Authorities (Chairmen)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many regional and district health authority chairmanships are currently vacant; and how long the vacancies have existed.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 9 November 1984, c. 47]: No regional health authority chairmanships are currently vacant. One district health authority chairmanship [Preston] is currently vacant and has been so since 1 April 1984.

Depo Provera

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the light of the findings of the United States Food and Drugs Administration, he will review the continued use of Depo Provera; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 12 November 1984]: A public board of inquiry set up by the United States Government Food and Drugs Administration has, I understand, recommended that Depo Provera should not be licensed in the US for long-term contraceptive use because it considered there was insufficient evidence of the long-term safety of the product. The present position is that the FDA is considering the report, which we have not yet seen. I understand that the manufacturer of Depo Provera intends to file an exception to the recommendation. We will study the board of inquiry's report and the FDA's decision on it as soon as this is known.

We originally refused to license this drug for long-term contraceptive use in 1982. However, evidence of the safety of Depo Provera, including, I understand the evidence considered by the United States board of inquiry, was reviewed in the United Kingdom by a special panel, chaired by Professor Rosalinde Hurley, which held a hearing in public on the issue in 1983 and reported to the Health Ministers in April 1984. As I explained to the House on 11 April 1984 at c. 281-283 we decided that, in the light of the panel's report, Depo Provera should be licensed in the United Kingdom for long-term contraceptive use only where other forms of contraception are unsuitable and subject to certain safeguards. We would review this decision in the light of any significant new evidence about it we received as we would review the licensing of any other drug in such circumstances.

Doctors

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many doctors were unemployed in England and Wales at the latest available date; and what were the corresponding figures for June 1979.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 12 November 1984]: The number registered as unemployed and seeking work as medical practitioners in England and Wales was 316 in June 1979 and 1,288 on 9 September 1982, the last date for which comparable information is available. After October 1982 registration with the Professional and Executive Register of the Manpower Services Commission became voluntary and we can no longer provide comparable figures. The old figures could be taken only as an approximate indication of the number of unemployed doctors at the time. We have no evidence of any significant unemployment of doctors at the present time and we still have some posts which are hard to fill.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the real increase in prescription charges after allowing for inflation in the years 1979 to 1984 for each category of health service charges.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 12 November 1984]: The information is as follows:

	Percentage increase
Prescription charge	389
Pre-payment certificate—annual	320

	Percentage increase
Elastic stocking (single)	108
Elastic hosiery (excluding stockings)	292
Wigs and fabric supports
Full bespoke human hair wig	317
Partial human hair wig	161
Stock modacrylic wig	292
Abdominal and spinal support	254
Surgical brassiere	125

These increases all start from an artificially low base, in my opinion, as previous Governments had, for reasons not known to me, decided to freeze the level of charges.

Note: The figures have been deflated by the movement in the retail price index between April 1979 and April 1984.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Defence

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he agrees with the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and United States defence chiefs that nuclear war is a feasible and sound defence strategy and survivable.

Mr. Stanley: The whole purpose of NATO's deterrence strategy is to ensure that neither nuclear nor conventional war ever occurs and that peace with freedom is preserved in Western Europe as it has been for almost 40 years.

General Belgrano

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish as a defence open government document under the Croham directive, background material prepared for Ministers on the circumstances surrounding the sinking of the General Belgrano.

Mr. Heseltine: No. The Prime Minister has already published a detailed account of the circumstances surrounding the sinking of the General Belgrano.

Animals (Research)

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the present number of animals being used by his Department for matters concerning defence research.

Mr. Lee: The number of experiments in 1983 was just under 10,000. Figures are kept in a form appropriate to the requirement to report the number of such experiments annually to the Home Department, and the figures for 1984 will be available in due course.

Trident Missile

21. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the latest estimate of the total cost in pounds sterling of the purchase of Trident.

25. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the estimated cost of Trident.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh).

Strategic Forces

22. Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his review of strategic forces.

32. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of his review of strategic forces.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Members to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson).

Round the World Race (Services Yacht)

23. Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Defence what contribution in terms of funding he expects to make to the services yacht entered in the Whitbread round the world race in 1986.

Mr. Lee: As announced in a written parliamentary Answer on 29 June 1984, we have decided not to enter a services' yacht in the 1985-86 round the world yacht race.

Nuclear Weapons

24. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is satisfied that at all times his Department is fully aware of the position of all nuclear weapons under foreign control in the United Kingdom or United Kingdom territorial waters.

Mr. Stanley: Yes, so far as US nuclear weapons based in this country are concerned. The position in United Kingdom territorial waters at any given moment, of all foreign naval vessels which may or may not be carrying nuclear weapons cannot be known precisely.

New Fighter Aircraft

26. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in talks with France, West Germany, Italy and Spain regarding a new fighter aircraft.

Mr. Butler: I have nothing to add to the answer given to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on 23 October, at column 550.

Regular Army Reserve

27. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will increase the level of active training available to the Regular Army Reserve.

Mr. Stanley: We already have plans to increase the level of active training available to the Regular Army Reserve. As we announced in SDE 83, we are introducing a scheme which will offer a week of refresher training to Regular Army reservists in their third year out of the Army, and this will begin next year. In addition, Regular Army reservists will continue to have the opportunity to participate in field exercises, including in 1985 the home defence exercise Brave Defender.

Royal Ordnance Factories

28. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the proposed redundancies at the royal ordnance factories.

Mr. Butler: I regret that a significant fall in the forward work load, resulting largely from a reduction in the Ministry's ammunition requirements for 1985-86, made it necessary to announce schemes of redundancy at four royal ordnance factories on 2 November 1984. The total reduction of posts in the worst case will be 1,819 (595 at ROF Birtley, 602 at ROF Bishopton, 145 at ROF Blackburn, 477 at ROF Chorley). These redundancies are in no way due to the impending change of status of the ROFs; as has always been the case, ROF employment levels depend on the state of the order book. All possibilities for additional work continue to be explored.

AQD Laboratories, Harefield

29. Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations have taken place with the trade unions concerning the proposal to close the AQD Laboratories at Harefield.

Mr. Lee: The agreed procedures were followed. The trade unions were informed of the proposal in writing and given an opportunity to comment and meet the official side. After some discussion the decision has now been made to withdraw the quality assurance elements.

RAF Trainer

30. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to make an announcement on the preferred design for the new AST 412 trainer for the Royal Air Force.

Mr. Butler: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope).

Departmental Costs

31. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what further action he is taking to control the total running costs of his Department.

Mr. Butler: We have made clear our intention to reduce the running costs of the Department. This is being achieved by such means as changes in organisation and working practices, the contractorisation of tasks and a continuing process of review and cost monitoring. I would refer my hon. Friend to chapter 2 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984" and also to the reply given by my predecessor to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) on 10 July, at column 449, where some of these measures — and the resultant benefits — are noted. The reorganisation of the Department, which was announced in Cmnd. 9315, will come into effect on 2 January 1985.

Trident Missiles

33. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the likely total cost to public expenditure of the purchase of the Trident missile system.

34. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimate for the cost of the Trident weapon system.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Member and my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh).

Cruise Missiles

35. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many land-based cruise missiles have been deployed in the United Kingdom; what further deployments are planned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The then Secretary of State for Defence announced on 17 June 1980 that six flights of ground-launched cruise missiles would be based at RAF Greenham common and four at RAF Molesworth. These plans have not changed. As I explained in answer to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) on 26 June, information on the deployment of nuclear forces, including ground-launched cruise missiles, will be provided in the annual "Statement on the Defence Estimates".

Greenham Common

36. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he next expects to visit Greenham common; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend has visited RAF Greenham common previously and has no immediate plans to visit again.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the security situation at Greenham common.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on 24 July 1984, at column 805.

Recruitment

37. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about progress with recruiting for the armed services.

Mr. Stanley: Overall recruiting to the armed services remains good. In 1983-84 some 37,000 men and women entered the armed services on regular engagements and this year we expect to recruit a similar number. Recruiting targets are generally being met except for a few areas such as some officer categories, technicians and skilled tradesmen.

Nuclear Tests (Australia)

38. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consultation he has had with the Australian Government about the Royal Commission which is investigating British nuclear tests carried out in Australia in the 1950s and 1960s; and if he will make a statement on the evidence which has been given by Australian ex-service men regarding activities within the purview of his Department.

Mr. Butler: In accordance with the Prime Minister's assurances to Mr. Hawke, the Australian Prime Minister, and as indicated by my predecessor the hon. Member for Chertsey and Walton (Mr. Pattie) in answer to a question on 27 July, at column 838, Her Majesty's Government are co-operating fully with the Australian Government in dealing with the Royal Commission. I am not prepared to comment on the evidence which is reported to have been given by Australian ex-service men.

United States Export Administration Act

39. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many computers there are in his Department over which the United States could claim extra-territorial jurisdiction under the United States Export Administration Act; and whether he has any policy about compliance with that Act as to the movements of such computers.

Mr. Butler: The majority of MOD computers are of United Kingdom manufacture. United States export control regulations have no force in United Kingdom law and the Ministry of Defence makes its own decisions on the use and deployment of its computers.

Falkland Islands

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Falkland islanders are employed by his Department in the Falkland Islands; in what capacity; and how rates of pay compare with the equivalent grade of British personnel with whom they are working.

Mr. Stanley: There are none at the present time.

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many people, civil and military, have been transported to Britain from the Falkland Islands for medical treatment since the cessation of hostilities in the Falklands; and if he will estimate the cost of this service (a) for military personnel and (b) for civilians.

Mr. Stanley: 620 military personnel and 140 civilians have been flown to Britain from the Falkland Islands for medical treatment up to the end of September 1984. The air passages have been on scheduled RAF flights and the notional cost to the Department of the space occupied, either by seated patients or patients on stretchers is some £1,500 a patient.

Mr. David Young asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel are on their second, third or any subsequent tour in the Falklands; how many of them (a) are in receipt of the Falklands allowance and (b) are not; and if he will consider changing the rules relating to the payment of the allowances payable after a certain number of days in the Falklands in that or any subsequent tour.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 12 November 1984, c. 152]: This information is not held centrally and could not be obtained except at disproportionate cost. However, we estimate that during the course of a year approximately 550 Royal Navy, 400 Army and 230 RAF personnel may receive the Falkland Islands allowance. The consideration of changes to the rules for the allowance is a matter for the Armed Forces Pay Review Body in the first instance, which has said that it will keep it under constant review.

HMS Conqueror

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has consulted either of the logs of HMS Conqueror when answering parliamentary questions relating to the movements of HMS Conqueror during the Falklands war.

Mr. Heseltine: I understand that the account of the captain of HMS Conqueror and his formal report of proceedings have been consulted during the preparation of answers to parliamentary questions relating to the movements of HMS Conqueror during the Falklands campaign. Given the information contained in the capatain's narrative account and his formal report of proceedings, it had not been necessary to consult the control room log for this purpose. It was for this reason that its disappearance did not come to light until the hon. Member asked about the "log of Conqueror's movements" for 2 to 4 May 1982, which prompted officials to ask to see the control room log in addition to the documents already available to them.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he became aware that the navigational log of HMS Conqueror was missing.

Mr. Heseltine: As I explained yesterday in answer to questions from the hon. Members for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), the first indications that the control room log could be missing appeared in the first week of October, when an official in my Department asked to see it in the context of dealing with inquiries from the hon. Member. Initial attempts to locate the log in the archives, at the naval headquarters at Northwood, and on board the submarine, proved unsuccessful, although an increasingly intensive search was mounted in the first half of October. I was not personally involved at this stage, although my office was aware that a search was under way. On 17 October the apparent disappearance of the log was formally reported to the offices of Ministers and senior MOD management concerned.

The log is a classified document. As the Prime Minister pointed out to the hon. Member in her letter to him of 8 October and repeated in her written answer to him of 22 October, at columns 788-791, there could be no question of placing a classified document of this kind, or extracts from it, in the House of Commons Library or publishing it in any way. But, given the importance of tracing a missing classified document, a full search was mounted and a formal board of inquiry established on 25 October. I was myself informed of where matters stood shortly after my return from the middle east at the beginning of November.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the missing log of HMS Conqueror contains details of HMS Conqueror's movements and position from 2 to 4 May 1982.

Mr. Heseltine: I would expect that to be the case.

Mr. Foulkes: asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the navigational log of HMS Conqueror has been seen by any officials of his Department since the end of the Falklands conflict.

Mr. Heseltine: That is a matter for the board of inquiry.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the navigational log of HMS Conqueror has been seen by Ministers since the end of the Falklands conflict.

Mr. Heseltine: No.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the commander's log of HMS Conqueror has been in the Ministry of Defence since the end of the Falklands conflict.

Mr. Heseltine: The account of the captain of HMS Conqueror has been in the possession of the flag officer submarines since the beginning of July 1982.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in full the report of the board of inquiry into the loss of the navigational log of HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Heseltine: It is not our practice to publish reports of boards of inquiry. I will consider whether to make a statement once the report of the board of inquiry is available.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what security classification was attached to the missing log of HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 12 November to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell).

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any photographic reproduction or other copy of the missing log of HMS Conqueror is available to him.

Mr. Heseltine: No.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Defence if military personnel have been on duty outside collieries in 1984 in connection with the coal industry dispute.

Mr. Stanley: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Barnsley, East (Mr. Patchett) on 21 May 1984, at column 372.

Ships' Logs

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the arrangements for keeping navigational and captains' logs of Her Majesty's ships; and whether they are normally kept together.

Mr. Heseltine: Instructions for keeping navigational logs are laid down in Queen's Regulations for the Royal Navy, which are available in the Library. Completed logs for both submarines and surface ships are sent to the Ministry of Defence records office. In addition, the flag officer submarines issues instructions for the keeping by submarines of detailed narrative accounts of exercises and operations, to support the commanding officer's formal report of proceedings submitted to his operational commander.

British Army of the Rhine

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current cost of maintaining the British Army of the Rhine; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: As stated in table 2.3 in volume II of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1984", the cost of the British Army of the Rhine is estimated to be some £1,796 million in 1984-85 at 1984-85 Estimates prices.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Labour Statistics

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will list the percentage of unemployed in Ulster on (a) a constituency basis and (b) a ward basis at the latest available date;

(2) if he will list the percentage of unemployment in Belfast on (a) a constituency basis and (b) a ward basis at the latest date;

(3) if he will list the level of unemployment in the city of Belfast on (a) a constituency basis and (b) a ward basis at the latest date; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: The number of unemployed in each constituency and ward at October 1984 is as follows. Unemployment rates are available only for travel-to-work areas.

The decrease shown by the October figures is to be welcomed and largely counterbalances the increase in the previous month. These changes are largely due to seasonal influences. I am encouraged by the longer-term changes in unemployment trends. The underlying upward trend has slowed and we are seeing a greater stability in the numbers in employment.

Health and Social Services Boards

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he has taken, or intends to take, in regard to the report by the Northern Ireland Comptroller and Auditor General on the 1982-83 accounts of health and social services boards about financial control of the health and social services accounts for North and West Belfast district of the eastern board.

Mr. Chris Patten: I have expressed my concern to the chairman of the eastern board and the board is taking urgent action to remedy deficiencies in financial control in the former North and West Belfast district. The district is now reorganised into three units of management; new senior staff are in post and new systems are being introduced. The board is to provide regular progress reports on these matters to the Department.

Mr. Beggs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if disciplinary action has been taken against any member of staff in connection with financial abuses in the North and West Belfast district of the Eastern Health and Social Services Board in 1982-83.

Mr. Chris Patten: No, but the board's investigation is continuing.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

School Governing Bodies (Representation)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the Government's policy towards proposals for statutory student representation on school governing bodies; and whether any studies on this issue are currently, or have been, undertaken by his Department.

Mr. Dunn: The Government's proposals for the future composition of school governing bodies in the Green Paper "Parental Influence at School" (Cmnd. 9242) did not include provision for pupil governors. The Department has undertaken no particular study of this issue, nor does it expect to do so.

Medical Research Council

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many projects the Medical Research Council has labelled approved but not funded in the last year; which projects they are; and what plans there are for their future funding and research.

Mr. Brooke: In the academic year 1983-84 the Medical Research Council approved but was unable to fund 199 applications for project grants — usually of three years' duration—and 22 applications for longer-term support for research programmes. I understand that the projects cover a wide range of biomedical research, but that their details are regarded as confidential as between the council and the applicants. I understand that the council has no plans for a systematic reconsideration of these applications.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many children from Essex have received places under the assisted places scheme in each of the years since the scheme was introduced; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Information is not collected on the home address of assisted pupils. The numbers of pupils admitted to assisted places in the four participating schools in Essex have been as follows:

School year	Number of assisted pupils
1981-82	55
1982-83	60
1983-84	72
1984-85	63

Student Grants

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about levels of student grants and parental contributions in 1985-86.

Mr. Brooke: Subject to parliamentary approval, the main rates of student grant will be increased by around 3 per cent. in 1985-86. The parental contribution scale will be adjusted upwards in line with earnings, but contributions from those in the middle and upper reaches of the scale will be increased. The minimum maintenance award will be abolished and parents at the upper end of the scale will also be assessed to contribute towards designated tuition fees. For those families with more than one award-holder there will be a limit on their contribution of £4,000.

The following table compares the proposed parental contribution scale for 1985-86 with the existing scale for 1984-85:

Parental contribution scale

Residual Income £	1984-85 Contribution £	1985-86 Contribution £

* Scale continues at £1 for every complete £6 of additional income.

† Scale continues at £1 for every complete £4 of additional income to a maximum contribution of £4,000.

Notes:

1. For 1985-86 the rate of contribution is assessed at £1 in £7 for residual incomes from £8,100 to £10,300; then £1 in £5 to £15,000; then £1 in £4 thereafter. In 1984-85 the rate of contribution was assessed at £1 in £7 for residual incomes from £7,600 to £9,700; then £1 in £6 thereafter.

2. The contribution payable may be less than the amounts shown in the scale, particularly at its top end. This will depend on the amount of the award (maintenance and fees) towards which the contribution has to be made and whether any of the assessed contribution is offset by allowances for other dependent children.

3. In 1985-86 there will be a maximum parental contribution of £4,000 per family which will protect families with more than one award-holder.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Dr. Alan Clift

Mr. Ashley asked the Attorney-General at whose instigation the Director of Public Prosecutions investigation into the alleged irregularities in the work of Dr. Clift was undertaken; how long the investigation took; how many cases were considered; which forensic experts helped with the inquiry; what was the result of the inquiry; and if a press statement was released regarding the decision not to take criminal proceedings against Dr. Clift.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions asked the police to look into alleged irregularities in the work of Dr. Clift after the matter had been referred to him by the Home Office. The investigation lasted from 12 September 1977 to 11 October 1978 and was carried out by an officer from the Devon and Cornwall constabulary. In the course of that investigation 59 cases in which Dr. Clift had been involved were considered. Dr. Margaret Pereira was seconded to help with the police inquiry. The decision of the Director of Public Prosecutions was that the available evidence was not such as to justify any criminal proceedings against Dr. Clift. There was no press release by the Home Office at the time of the Director's decision, but the information was confirmed on request.

Offenders (Trial Delays)

Mr. Skeet asked the Attorney-General what caused the delay in bringing offenders to trial in the cases of the petty sessional divisions of Chesterfield, Rotherham, Mansfield, St. Helens and Peterlee prior to the coal industry dispute in March; what is the position today; and what are the dates of the appointment of every new stipendiary to these benches, the number of cases tried by each since their appointment and the number of cases remaining to be tried in these areas.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply.

I understand from inquiries that have been made in the first three months of 1984 defendants pleading not guilty before these courts were normally tried within six to eight weeks of entering their plea. That waiting time was necessary to enable the prosecution and defence to prepare their case. Defendants pleading guilty in person were normally sentenced within three weeks or less.

The position with regard to guilty pleas at these courts remains unchanged. Mainly because of the extra business generated by the miners' dispute, the waiting time between a not guilty plea and trial is now approximately 12 weeks in Chesterfield and Mansfield; eight to 10 weeks at Rotherham; nine weeks at St. Helens and eight weeks at Peterlee.

Stipendiaries have sat at these courts at the following times:

Chesterfield	—	One from 3 to 12 October; two since 15 October
Rotherham	—	One since 3 September
Mansfield	—	One from 5 to 16 November

St. Helens — One on ten days between 10 October and 8 November; more dates arranged up to 12 December
Peterlee — One from 22 to 26 October.

Information is not readily available about the numbers of cases they have tried, but, in view of the wide variation in the time needed to deal with individual cases, this would not in any event provide a reliable indication of the stipendiaries' usefulness in relieving pressure on the courts. We understand that the stipendiaries have not been confined to dealing with cases arising from the miners' dispute. The number of cases arising from the dispute which remained outstanding on 8 November at each of these courts is as follows:

	Numbers
Chesterfield	454
Rotherham	214
Mansfield	296
St. Helens	80
Peterlee	60

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

West Germany

56. Mr. Lambie asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met his West German counterpart to discuss matters relating to the European Community; and what subjects were discussed.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I last discussed European Community matters with Herr Genscher at the Foreign Affairs Council in Luxembourg on 22 and 23 October. Discussions at that meeting concentrated on the negotiations for Spanish and Portuguese accession.

Spanish Accession

58. Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the benefits to the people of the United Kingdom of Spanish accession to the European Economic Community; and on what institutional, financial and economic conditions the United Kingdom will support Spanish accession.

Mr. Rifkind: The United Kingdom has given consistent support to the principle of Spanish and Portuguese accession, which we believe to be important for the consolidation of democracy and stability in Europe. In acceding to the Community, Spain will be accepting the rules and regulations of the Community — the acquis Communautaire. Detailed negotiations on transitional arrangements representing a fair balance between the interests of the member states and of the applicant countries are still in progress.

British Rebate

61. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the 1984 ad hoc British rebate agreed at Fontainebleau is included in the draft 1985 Community budget.

Mr. Rifkind: No. It was confirmed at the Foreign Affairs Council on 2 and 3 October that our 1984 rebate should be made on the revenue side by abatement of our VAT contribution, as agreed at Fontainebleau.

European Union

62. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he now considers that the necessity for improved decision making in the EEC requires some advance towards the concept of European union.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Fontainebleau European Council set up an ad hoc committee to look into the improved operation of the Community. Better decision-making is one of the many topics under discussion. I should not wish to anticipate the committee's conclusions; but the first priority is clearly to concentrate on securing full implementation of the existing treaty.

Budget Discipline

63. Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of budget discipline discussions at recent Foreign Affairs Council meetings.

65. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in securing financial discipline over the European Economic Community budget.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Considerable progress has been made. A text guaranteeing the effective application of the principles agreed by Heads of Government was substantially agreed at the Council of Finance Ministers and the Foreign Affairs Council this week. We hope this text will be formally adopted at the Foreign Affairs Council later this month.

Spain and Portugal

64. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he now expects the accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community to take place.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd).

Financial Obligations

66. Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the details of the intergovernmental agreement to cover the Community's inescapable financial obligations for 1984.

Mr. Rifkind: A copy of the agreement has been placed in the Library of the House.

Reforms

67. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement outlining the progress made in securing reforms in the Common Market during the summer adjournment.

Mr. Rifkind: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) on 23 October, at column 538, considerable progress has been made towards resolving the outstanding budget issues. At the Foreign Affairs Council on 2-3 October member states reaffirmed their commitment to paying the United Kingdom's abatement for 1984 on the revenue side of the budget in 1985 as agreed at Fontainebleau. The Council also concluded an inter-governmental agreement covering the Community's inescapable financial obligations for 1984. The United Kingdom made it clear that its contribution to this arrangement depended upon release of our 1983 refunds and agreement on a budget discipline text which implements the conclusions of the European Council. Work to complete this text, and the text of the new own resources decision, is continuing. The European Parliament voted on 10 October to release the United Kingdom's refunds for 1983.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Oil Exploration and Production Equipment

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total value of imports of oil exploration and production equipment in the years (a) 1982 and (b) 1983.

Mr. Fletcher: The fob value of goods imported for the exploration, development and production of United Kingdom continental shelf oil and gas is given in table 9.1 of the "United Kingdom Balance of Payments" (1984 edition), which is available in the Library.

Johnson Group Cleaners (Merseyside)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what representations he has received concerning the proposed takeover bid by Nottingham Manufacturing Company for Johnson Group Cleaners (Merseyside); and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will refer the take over bid by Nottingham manufacturing Co. for Johnson Group Cleaners (Merseyside) to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission;

(3) if he will refer to the Office of Fair Trading the takeover bid for the Johnson Group Cleaners (Merseyside) by the Nottingham Manufacturing Company.

Mr. Fletcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Mr. John Preece (Appeal Court Transcript)

Mr. Ashley asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will arrange for the transcription of the shorthand notes of the John Preece Appeal Court hearing; and if he will place it in the Library.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Shorthand notes were taken of evidence given on 9, 10, 11 and 12 June 1981 at the Appeal Court in the case of John Preece. These could be extended at a cost of approximately £1,000. I am not persuaded that such expense is justified.

PRIME MINISTER

Cabinet Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister if she will give the numbers and names of the Cabinet committees and sub-committees, both ad hoc and permanent, currently in operation.

The Prime Minister: There continue to be four standing committees of the Cabinet: a defence and overseas policy committee and an economic strategy committee under my chairmanship; a home and social affairs committee under the chairmanship of my right Hon. and noble Friend the Lord President of the Council; and a legislation committee under the chairmanship of my right hon. Friend the Lord Privy Seal. Attendance at these committees will vary according to the subject under discussion. Sub-committees of the standing committees will be continued or established as appropriate. Membership and terms of reference of the standing committees and their sub-committees will remain confidential.

WALES

Roads

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will show for each county council (a) provisional outturn expenditure in 1983-84, (b) planned expenditure in 1984-85 and 1985-86 on (i) highway structural maintenance, (ii) highway routine maintenance and (iii) highway capital.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: Information about planned expenditure by local highway authorities for 1984-85 and 1985-86 is not held centrally.

Provisional outturn expenditure for 1983-84 on highway maintenance and highway capital is as follows. No breakdown between structural and general maintenance is available.

	Maintenance	£'000 Capital
Clwyd	9,081	5,700
Dyfed	11,427	5,585
Gwent	6,233	15,013

Powys	7,051	2,846
South Glamorgan	6,020	11,027
West Glamorgan	5,507	4,448

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for the years 1982, 1983 and 1984, the numbers of kilometres of (a) trunk motorways, (b) other trunk roads, (c) local authority motorways, (d) other principal roads and (e) other roads.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: The information requested is as follows:

Road Lengths in Wales

	Kilometres
	1982	1983	1984
(a) Trunk motorways	120	120	120
(b) Other trunk roads	1,645	1,648	1,654

(e) Other roads	27,830	28,110	28,150
*Total	32,039	32,339	32,400

* Figures do not add to common totals because of rounding.

Holyhead

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will consider special measures to alleviate the level of unemployment in Holyhead.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Every opportunity is taken and will continue to be pursued to safeguard employment and provide new jobs in the area, which is well placed to benefit from both domestic and European assistance. Existing policies and programmes, including in general the work of agencies within Wales with a remit to develop the economic potential of the Principality, provide for employment and training opportunities, grants for industrial projects, programmes of infrastructure development including road construction and factory building, urban programme and European Community schemes.

Housing

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the latest estimate of the number of dwellings in Wales which are in need of (a) standard amenities and (b) repairs costing £2,500 or more; and if he will estimate the cost of bringing these dwellings up to a reasonable standard.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The 1981 Welsh House Condition Survey indicates that about 84,000 dwellings lacked one or more of the basic amenities and that about 250,000 dwellings (excluding second homes) needed repairs in excess of £2,500. At that time the cost of providing amenities and of eliminating disrepair over the £2,500 limit was estimated to be about £850 million.

Housing Improvement Grants

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will ensure that housing improvement grants are paid only against proper value added tax registered invoices and not against estimates;

(2) what proposals he has to ensure that housing improvement grant work is carried out only by competent and bona fide builders;

(3) if he is satisfied that the present improvement grant system ensures that public funds are spent cost-effectively and are concentrated on those properties most in need.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: We have been reviewing the workings of the renovation grant system as part of our overall examination of private sector improvement policy. We will shortly be announcing the results of the review.

Sheep

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the present state of the sheep industry in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The Welsh sheep industry continues to receive substantial benefits from the EC sheepmeat regime.

The provisional figures from the June 1984 census indicate that the Welsh breeding flock has increased by 2·9 per cent. since June 1983.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

India

2. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on recent events in India.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We mourn the assassination of Mrs. Gandhi. She was a great leader of her country, and a true friend of Britain. We utterly condemn the tiny minority of people in this country who have sought to exploit, and even to rejoice at, this despicable act.

We look forward to maintaining our excellent relations with India under her new Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, and wish him well in his determined efforts to ensure peace and stability throughout India.

South Africa

3. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current state of diplomatic relations with the Republic of South Africa.

12. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's relations with South Africa.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have full diplomatic relations with South Africa. These are necessary to protect our major interests there and to make known to the South African authorities our views on matters of concern to us.

44. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, if he intends to break off relations with the South African Government in the foreseeable future.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No.

Latin American Debts

10. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what role he expects Her Majesty's Government to play in resolving the Latin American debt crisis.

Mr. Rifkind: We will continue to work constructively with other Governments, international institutions and banks to tackle the problem of Latin American debt. The soundest way to create conditions for renewed growth, and thereby to ease the debt problem, is to build on the strategy developed so far.

British Consulate, Durban (UDF Members)

11. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the denial of family and legal access to the three members of the UDF in the British consulate in Durban.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: On a number of occasions they or those visiting them indulged in political activity, and thus abused our consular premises. In the absence of any assurance that this would cease we had no choice but to withdraw permission for visitors, except for doctors where necessary.

Central America

13. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek an early meeting with the United States Secretary of State to discuss central America.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We are in constant touch with the United States Government at many levels on matters of current concern including central America.

British Embassies and Consulates

14. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to make changes in the establishments of British embassies and consulates overseas.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The number and size of British embassies and consulates overseas are now being reviewed in the light of the outcome of the public expenditure survey.

Arms Control

15. Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what new initiatives on arms control are being proposed by his Department.

Mr. Luce: The British Government remain strongly committed to the pursuit of arms control agreements. In close consultation with our allies, we have tabled ourselves, or been fully associated with, positive proposals in all the disarmament fora. There has been a disappointing lack of progress, but we shall continue to work vigorously with our allies to persuade the Soviet Union of our mutual interest in balanced reductions in levels of forces and arms expenditure.

South African Citizens (Trial)

16. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what have been the effects on bilateral relations with the South African Government of their non-compliance with the pledge given to the court in Coventry by four South African citizens.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: A serious disagreement of this nature must inevitably affect bilateral relations. The South African Government are in no doubt about our views on this matter, which were made clear to this House by my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) in his statement on 23 October.

Middle East

17. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of his recent visit to Israel.

27. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Israel.

32. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on his visit to Israel.

39. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement concerning his recent visit to Israel.

41. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about his visit to Israel.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I refer my hon. Friends and the hon. and learned Member to the reply I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris).

33. Mr. Ottaway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent visit to the Lebanon.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: During my visit to Lebanon on 28 October I had useful discussions with President Gemayel and Prime Minister Karame. I expressed our support for the Lebanese Government's efforts to restore their authority and to promote national reconciliation and for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

34. Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress towards peace in the middle east following his recent visits to the area.

47. Mr. Heffer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the recent visit to the Lebanon and Israel; and what steps are required to bring peace to the area.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend's talks in Lebanon and Israel convinced him of the urgency and importance of early progress towards a solution of the Arab-Israel dispute. He made clear, both to the Governments concerned and to the Palestinians he met, our view that a negotiated settlement of the Arab-Israel dispute must be based on the two principles of secure existence for Israel and self-determination for the Palestinians. With our European partners we remain ready to contribute to peaceful solutions to these conflicts and that in the Gulf. But the primary responsibility to initiate progress lies with the parties directly concerned. My right hon. and learned Friend was encouraged to find the Governments of Lebanon and Israel committed to the success of the military talks, which began on 8 November, to discuss arrangements for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Lebanon.

Namibia

18. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom policy regarding Namibia.

Mr. Rifkind: We welcome the continuing contacts between the Governments of South Africa, Angola and the United States. We have been particularly encouraged to learn that the three Governments are currently discussing new proposals. We hope that these will lead to early completion of South African disengagement from Southern Angola and to the Implementation of Security Council resolution (SCR) 435.

South Georgia

19. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his proposals to withdraw responsibility for South Georgia from the Falkland Islands Government.

Mr. Renton: We intend to promulgate a new Constitution for the Falkland Islands next year. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made clear to the House, South Georgia (and the South Sandwich Islands) are a separate Dependent Territory. They have been administered from Port Stanley purely as a matter of convenience; future constitutional and administrative arrangements for them are under consideration.

Chile

21. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on future relations with the Government of Chile.

Mr. Renton: We are seriously concerned at recent developments in Chile. The basic aim must be to encourage a return to political dialogue and democracy.

Afghanistan

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent assessment his Department has made of events in Afghanistan.

Mr. Renton: Tomorrow in the United Nations General Assembly we and the vast majority of the international community will again condemn the Soviet military presence in Afghanistan. The situation within that tragic country is grim. Afghan civilians continue to be subject to indiscriminate and savage attacks. But strong and spontaneous resistance to the Soviet military occupation continues throughout the country, and shows no sign of succumbing to brute force.

Zimbabwe

22. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next intends to seek to visit Zimbabwe.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hcn. and learned Friend has no immediate plans to do so.

Gibraltar (Spanish Citizens)

23. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement regarding an arrangement with the Spanish Government and Her Majesty's Government that Spanish nationals are to have the right to work and live in the dependent territory of Gibraltar.

Mr. Renton: No such arrangement has been concluded Spanish nationals will be entitled to full rights under the EC treaty throughout the Community, including Gibraltar, on Spain's accession, subject to any transitional periods and derogations to be agreed between the Community and Spain. Spanish nationals may currently both live and work in Gibraltar, subject to the requirements of Gibraltar's legislation.

Falkland Islands

24. Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the possibility of resuming talks with Argentina about the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Renton: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 31 October, we remain ready to work for more normal bilateral relations with Argentina. We are not prepared to discuss sovereignty, and hope that the Argentine Government will not continue to insist on linking discussion of normalisation with discussion of sovereignty in the way which caused deadlock at Berne in July.

Ethiopia

25. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any discussions have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Ethiopian Government about the difficulties faced by relief agencies operating in areas of Ethiopia affected by internal civil war.

Mr. Rifkind: Yes. We have expressed our concern to the Ethopian Government over the difficulties which the fighting in Ethiopia poses for relief agencies, most recently when my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development met Mr. Dawit Wolde-Giorgis, the Commissioner for Relief and Rehabilitation, on 7 November.

Soviet Foreign Minister

26. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet the Soviet Foreign Minister.

Mr. Rifkind: Mr. Gromyko has accepted the invitation to visit this country in 1985 which my right hon. and learned Friend extended during his visit to Moscow in July. The question of dates is under discussion on diplomatic channels.

Intermediate Range Nuclear Weapons

28. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the likelihood of a resumption in the Geneva negotiations on intermediate range nuclear weapons.

Mr. Luce: We believe that President Reagan's confirmation of his full commitment to the pursuit of arms control provides the Soviet Union with a further opportunity to resume negotiations on limiting INF missiles. The United States, with the support of its allies, remains ready to do so without any preconditions, and we urge the Soviet Union to respond positively.

El Salvador

29. Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the implications for United Kingdom policy towards El Salvador of President Duarte's peace initiatives.

Mr. Renton: We welcome President Duarte's initiative, which is in line with his commitment to work for national reconciliation, to strengthen democracy and end human rights abuse in El Salvador. To demonstrate our support for these policies we have offered to resume a modest technical assistance programme and have made available £100,000 for emergency civilian supplies under our aid programme.

Poland

30. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Poland.

Mr. Rifkind: Following the recent amnesty in Poland and the release of virtually all the political detainees, the Government concluded that the time was now right to resume contacts with the Polish Government at Ministerial level. I therefore visited Poland from 3 to 7 November.

The visit was useful and successful. My aim was to gain a first-hand impression of the situation, to have contact with a broad range of Polish opinion and to put across British views and concerns. The visit achieved all three objectives.

I held talks with my host, the Polish Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, on bilateral issues and international topics of mutual concern. I also called on the Polish First Deputy Prime Minister, a Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister of Foreign Trade, the Chairman of the Polish Parliament's Foreign Relations Committee and the Deputy Minister for Economic Reform.

I was able to meet several Solidarity representatives as well as a representative of the Catholic Church.

There have been some positive developments in Poland. I was impressed by the degree of public expression and public debate which I encountered. It would, however, be unrealistic to suggest that a wide gap between the Government and the people does not still exist. I emphasised these points in my official and other discussions. I was also able to raise human rights aspects and to convey to my hosts the widespread concern in parliamentary and public circles in the United Kingdom at the continued detention of political prisoners including Bogdan Lis and Piotr Mierzejewski.

Our aim now is to work for a more normal bilateral relationship and to give our support to the much needed process of reconciliation in Poland. In our further exchanges with the Poles we shall reserve the right to continue to emphasise our concerns wherever appropriate.

Hong Kong

31. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when and by whom the draft agreement on Hong Kong will be signed.

Mr. Luce: The House will have an opportunity to debate the draft agreement at the beginning of December, and will wish to take into account the reports of the assessment office in Hong Kong and the independent monitoring team. If the agreement is acceptable to Parliament, it will be signed in Peking before the end of the year. Arrangements for the signature have not yet been finalised, but will be announced in due course.

45. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will take steps to introduce legislation similar to that which applies in Britain to rehabilitate those found guilty of minor crimes in Hong Kong.

Mr. Luce: This is a matter for the Hong Kong Government, who intend to issue by the end of 1984 a consultative paper for public discussion relating to the introduction of a possible "spent conviction" scheme in Hong Kong.

Nigeria

35. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to receive the new high commissioner from Nigeria.

Mr. Rifkind: We hope that it may be soon. The appointment of a new high commissioner from Nigeria would be an important and welcome step in restoring the traditional closeness of our bilateral relations.

Western European Union

36. Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his recent meeting with the other Foreign Ministers of the Western European Union.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have nothing to add to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) on 12 November to my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy).

46. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any reservations in regard to the current proposals for reactivation of the Western European Union or in regard to the suggested establishment of a European Defence Community.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no reservations in regard to the decision to make better use of Western European Union, and I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 12 November by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton).

I am not aware of any proposals for a European Defence Community.

Outer Space (Arms Control)

37. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will raise with the Soviet Foreign Secretary when he next meets him the question of the militarisation of outer space and the issues which prevent agreement.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend will continue to urge the Russians to respond positively and soon to the Americans' stated readiness to discuss all aspects of outer space arms control.

USSR (Jewish Emigrants)

38. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received any response from the Soviet authorities to representations he made earlier in the current year regarding individual cases of Soviet Jews who have been repeatedly refused permission to emigrate.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. and learned Friend has raised the question of human rights in the Soviet Union with Mr. Gromyko on three separate occasions this year and has specifically mentioned his concern at the plight of Soviet Jewry. Regrettably, there has been no response to these and to many other representations made to the Soviet Union about its failure to honour its obligations in the human rights field.

Soviet Union (Visas)

40. Sir Peter Blaker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the average annual number of Soviet citizens granted visas to visit the United Kingdom during the last 15 years; what is the average duration of such visas; and how these figures compare with the number of visas granted to United Kingdom citizens visiting the Soviet Union.

Mr. Rifkind: The annual numbers of Soviet citizens admitted to this country from 1970 to 1983 are as follows:

	Numbers
1970	5,889
1971	5,480
1972	4,717
1973	6,272
1974	7,401
1975	8,443
1976	9,397
1977	10,472
1978	11,294
1979	10,379
1980	8,674
1981	10,056
1982	10,371
1983	7,558

Nearly all these were short visits of 30 days or fewer. British citizens are not required to notify United Kingdom authorities of their intention to travel to the Soviet Union or to any other country. We therefore have no information of Soviet entry visas granted to British citizens.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will seek a further opportunity to raise with the Soviet Foreign Minister the cases of Ida Nudel and Vladimir Slepak and others who have been waiting for many years for exit visas to join family and friends outside the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. and learned Friend has raised the question of human rights with Mr. Gromyko on each occasion he has had talks with him. We will continue to remind the Soviet authorities of their human rights commitments at every suitable opportunity. The cases of Ida Nudel and Vladimir Slepak are well known to us. Mrs. Nudel's case has been raised with the Soviet Union at ministerial level on several occasions.

Israel (North Sea Oil)

42. Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, following his visit to Israel and his discussions there, he will ensure the lifting of restrictions on the sale of North sea oil to Israel and reconsider the policy of continuing the authentication of negative certificate of origin as required by those companies complying with the Arab trade boycott.

Mr. Luce: My right hon. and learned Friend made it clear during his visit to Israel that we have no plans to revise our guidance to companies exporting North sea crude oil. He also reiterated our opposition to the Arab boycott. Our policy is to encourage trade with both Israel and the Arab states, and I am glad to note that our trade with Israel is increasing. The long-standing procedures of Foreign and Commonwealth Office authentication of signatures on certificates of origin does not imply approval of the contents of the documents in question.

USSR

43. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Anglo-Soviet relations.

Mr. Rifkind: Our policy is to seek to improve United Kingdom-Soviet relations and to broaden East-West understanding. To this end we are increasing the frequency and variety of our contacts with the Soviet Union.

My right hon. and learned Friend's visit to Moscow in July and the expected return visit of Mr. Gromyko next year are part of this process. The coming visit, at the invitation of the British Group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, by a delegation from the Supreme Soviet led by Mr. Gorbachev will also offer a valuable opportunity for an exchange of views at a high level.

Egyptian Citizens

48. Mr. John Hunt asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the standards of courtesy extended by his consulate officials in Cairo to Egyptians wishing to visit the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I have no reason to doubt their courtesy.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council on 12-13 November.

Mr. Rifkind: A special Foreign Affairs Council on enlargement was held on 12-13 November to help prepare the Community's position for the negotiating conferences to be held with Spain and Portugal on 26-27 November. Discussion concentrated on Spanish and Portuguese fisheries and agriculture. The Council also made progress in discussion of the outstanding issues in the renegotiations of the Lomé convention. Ministers will meet again on 20 November.

Council endorsed the text on budget discipline on which a common position had been reached at the ECOFIN council. The text incorporates the measures necessary to guarantee the effective application of the principles agreed by Heads of Government. It will be discussed with the European Parliament later this month prior to its formal adoption by the Council.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Life Sentences

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of offenders given life sentences in 1982 and 1983, respectively, had committed homicide offences.

Mr. Mellor: Two hundred and fifty persons, including young offenders, were given life sentences in 1982 and 169 in 1983; the proportion of these sentences which were for homicide offences was 84 per cent. in 1982 and 82 per cent. in 1983.

Boys on Remand (Adult Penal Establishments)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the ages, location and length of time held of those 14 to 16-year-old boys on remand in adult penal establishments to the latest available date.

Mr. Mellor: The available information about 15 and 16-year-old boys is given in the following table; no 14-year-old boys were so held on 31 August 1984.

It is normal for young males to be kept apart from adult males.

Drugs Convention (Council of Europe)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration the Government are giving to the proposed international drugs convention under the auspices of the Council of Europe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: International co-operation is an essential component of the Government's strategy for combating drug misuse. We therefore welcome the attention which this topic is receiving in the Council of Europe, both in the Parliamentary Assembly and in the Pompidou Group—the Council of Europe co-operation group to combat drug abuse and illicit trafficking in drugs. The United Kingdom now chairs the Pompidou Group, and we regard that body as the principal forum for developing co-operation in western Europe, whether through formal legal instruments —which have not been put forward in the Assembly or in the Pompidou Group—or in less formal ways.

North Cornwall (Swimmers)

Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many rescues of swimmers in difficulty were performed off the beaches of north Cornwall and reported to the authorities during the most recent year for which information is available.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Such information is not collected centrally. However, my hon. Friend may be interested in a recent article on beach safety which contains some relevant information; it is in issue No. 67—summer 1984—of "Water Safety Today" which is published by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents. A copy of this publication has been placed in the Library of the House.

Court Cases

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time currently elapsing before a case is brought to court; and if he will make a statement about the effect of recent changes on the periods concerned.

Mr. Mellor: Information about waiting times in the magistrates' courts is not at present collected centrally, though we have recently completed a pilot study with a view to introducing a national collection scheme.

Information supplied by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor about the period from committal to commencement of trial in the Crown court is set out in the table. As the table shows, average waiting times in the Crown court have decreased significantly from the final quarter of 1979 to the third quarter of this year, despite an increase in the number of committals for trial in the Crown court by nearly a half in four years. This improvement reflects increases in resources, including the provision of additional court accommodation, the appointment of additional judges, and improvements in efficiency, in line with our general emphasis on making the best use of resources in both higher and lower courts.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many of the 31 cases of alleged assault on working miners in Derbyshire up to mid-September have been tried to date;

(2) how many of the 153 cases involving alleged threats against working miners and their families in Derbyshire up to mid-September have been tried to date;

(3) how many of the 278 cases in Derbyshire involving alleged damage to the homes and vehicles of working miners up to mid-September have been tried to date.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Immigration Act Prisoners (Transfer)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why on 5 July three Immigration Act prisoners were transferred to Her Majesty's prison Pentonville at short notice without any explanation.

Mr. Mellor: The three men were transferred from Ashford to Pentonville on 5 July for operational reasons. My noble Friend the Minister of State will write to the hon. Member giving further details.

Holloway Prison

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the staff employed at C1 psychiatric wing, Her Majesty's prison, Holloway, are registered mental nurses, state registered nurses and state enrolled nurses; and whether any of the staff are unqualified.

Mr. Mellor: Of the nursing staff normally employed in C1 wing, four are state enrolled nurses and 10 are state registered nurses. Five of the latter are also registered mental nurses. In addition, there are two auxiliary nurses without formal nursing qualifications.

Immigration

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals wishing to come to the United Kingdom from the Indian sub-continent as fiancés or fiancées or spouses of United Kingdom citizens are currently waiting an appointment for interview by an entry clearance officer.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested on husbands and male fiancés is pubished quarterly in the Home Office statistical bulletin "Control of Immigration: Statistics"—footnote 2 of table 10 of issue 19/84 for the second quarter of 1984. At the end of June 1984, 3,400 wives—including those whose husbands are not British citizens—were awaiting their first interview; female financées do not need to obtain entry clearance.

Mentally-sick Persons (Police Guidelines)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish any guidelines (a) he has issued and (b) the Metropolitan police have issued concerning police treatment of cases involving mental illness and whether any inter-disciplinary guidelines have been arrived at by either both the above or the local police affecting Leyton.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Guidance to the police on the treatment of mentally disordered persons is contained in section 4 of the "Consolidated Circular to the Police on Crime and Kindred Matters", and Home Office circular 69/1983, copies of which are in the Library of the House. I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that his force general orders reflect this guidance. No guidance on this subject has been issued by this Department or the commissioner addressed to agencies other than the police, but I understand that some guidelines on compulsory admissions procedure drawn up by the Waltham Forest district health authority were agreed by the Metropolitan police in December 1982.

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when it is intended to replace the police national computer with new hardware.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The PNC mainframe hardware will have completed 10 years of continous service by 1988, but final decisions have not yet been taken as to when and how best to replace it.

Television Reception

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the 90,000 people in the United Kingdom presently without a usable UHF television service are in Scotland; and whether he will now require the broadcasting authorities to provide UHF coverage to all communities consisting of 100 people or more.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The BBC and IBA estimate that between 30,000 and 50,000 people in Scotland are without a usable UHF television service. The third phase of the joint BBC/IBA engineering programme aims to extend UHF coverage to all unserved areas with a population of less than 500, wherever this is practicable. Although no lower limit is specified, the cost of providing a service for communities of fewer than 200 is in practice likely to prove prohibitive.

Kerb Crawlers

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women have been attacked by kerb crawlers in Liverpool in each of the past five years.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not available from records collected centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on the problem of kerb crawling in the inner city of Liverpool, details of which has been sent to him by the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside;

(2) what recent representations he has received concerning kerb crawling; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has asked for a report from the chief constable of Merseyside about the problem of kerb crawling in Liverpool, and will be replying to the hon. Member's letter of 6 November when he has received this report.

We are aware that kerb crawling constitutes a serious problem in many areas, including the hon. Member's constituency. In August this year, the Criminal Law Revision Committee published a report entitled "Prostitution in the Street" in which it recommended the creation of an offence to cover the nuisance of kerb crawling and two other offenses involving the soliciting of women by men. We welcome the committee's recommendations and, although there will be no early opportunity to give effect to them in Government legislation, we would support a Bill introduced by a private Member for that purpose.

Since the report was published, we have received representations from six hon. Members, five interested bodies and six members of the public, most but not all of whom supported the committee's recommendations.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from each appropriate chief constable as to their use of manpower to deal with the problems of kerb crawling in inner city areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. The deployment of police officers to deal with kerb crawling is an operational matter for each chief officer of police to determine in the light of the prevalence of the problem in an area and the other demands on his resources.

Prison Statistics

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in the last six months for which figures are available, how many people have served sentences in Her Majesty's prison Leeds for: (a) non-payment of fines and (b) how many of those serving sentences for non-payment of fines committed offences for which the court was unable to impose a custodial sentence.

Mr. Mellor: According to the records held centrally, about 1,200 persons were initially received into Leeds prison in the first six months of 1984 on committal in default of payment of a fine. The offences of these persons are not recorded in sufficient detail to make it possible to identify those who had been convicted of an offence for which a custodial sentence cannot be imposed.

Probation Officers

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many probation officers were in post in West Yorkshire on 31 March 1983, and 31 March 1984.

Mr. Mellor: Two hundred and eighty-five and 286, respectively, including those seconded to prison department establishments.

Housing Laws (Guernsey)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what responsibilities he has in relation to the housing laws in operation in Guernsey; and if he will make a statement of Government policy in this area.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None, unless the housing laws raise issues relevant to our international obligations.

Channel Islands

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made on the request made to the Channel Islands for an annual contribution to the costs of defence and international representation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that committees of the states in both Jersey and Guernsey are considering my right hon. and learned Friend's request.

R v Mr. Gillow (Costs)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the case of R v Mr. Gillow to be heard at the European Court of Justice; what he estimates will be the costs of the case; and whether he has asked the Government of Guernsey to pay the costs of the case.

Mr. Giles Shaw: A case has been brought before the European Commission of Human Rights by Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Gillow, but it is not clear at this stage whether or not the case will be referred to the European Court of Human Rights at Strasbourg. Guernsey is aware of the cost implications for it; but estimates are not yet possible.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the forensic experts who supplied evidence to the Home Office Retirement board which considered the case of Dr. Clift, indicating which were supportive and which critical of his overall professional integrity and which were independent of the Home Office.

Mr. Brittan: Evidence was supplied Dr. A. S. Curry, Professor S. S. Kind, Mr. N. B. Prance, Miss M. Pereira and Dr. B. Rees, who were at that time members of the Home Office forensic science service, and by Dr. B. B. Beeson, Dr. J. G. Renstead, Mr. L. Cann, Dr. J. A. G. Clarke, Dr. G. Garrett, Dr. D. Patterson, Dr. C. St. Hill, Mr. A. Thompson, Dr. L. Wise, Dr. R.C. Woodcock, and Mr. H. J. Yallop, who were not. The proceedings of a departmental retirement board are held in private and it would not be appropriate to publish or indicate the nature of material prepared for the proceedings relating to an individual member of staff.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library the original report prepared by Dr. Clift about forensic aspects of the alleged murder of Helen Wills by John Preece.

Mr. Brittan: I am placing in the Library a copy of the text of a report by Dr. Clift dated 8 February 1973, which I assume to be the report to which the right hon. Member is referring.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) prior to his suspension, if Dr. Clift was given any informal warnings, formal warnings, adverse reports, or chances to improve any alleged deficiences in his performance;

(2) if he will outline the procedure that is followed before an employee of his Department of the grade of Dr. Clift can be compulsorily retired; and whether it was followed in the case of Dr. Clift.

Mr. Brittan: The general principles governing the procedures for the compulsory retirement of non-industrial civil servants are set out in paragraphs 10510-10609 of the "Civil Service Pay and Conditions of Service Code", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. These envisage that, where an officer's performance deteriorates, there will be a series of reports, informal and formal warnings, and opportunities to improve performance. These procedures could not be followed in Dr. Clift's case because once it became clear that his work did not reach an acceptable standard of professional competence, he could not be allowed to continue as an expert witness. The Civil Service Appeal Board condidered the procedures which had been followed in Dr. Clift's case and decided that he had not been unfairly dismissed.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the reports and documents asked for by Dr. Clift and his solicitor which his Department refused to make available, indicating in each case why the request was refused.

Mr. Brittan: It is not possible to provide a complete list of the documents which were not made available to Dr. Clift and his solicitors as the requests were, in some cases, made in general terms. It would appear, however, that the principal documents which my Department declined to make available were the complete report of the police investigation into Dr. Clift's work; the statements by Home Office staff in the trial of Messrs. Morgan, Brown and Cowley; and the annual staff reports on Dr. Clift for the period 1972 to 1974. These were refused because they were not relevant to the issues which were being considered by the departmental retirement board. My Department did, however, make available all documents and records which related to the issues the board considered, including relevant extracts of the report of the police investigation, and the annual staff reports on Dr. Clift for the period 1975 to 1977.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many annual reports were made about Dr. Clift during his years as a Home Office forensic pathologist; in which years his work was criticised; and if he was informed of the criticism.

Mr. Brittan: Twenty-three staff reports were made on Dr. Clift — normally at annual intervals — during his service with the Home Office. These reports were confidential, and it is not the practice to publish details of them.

Intimidation

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the adequacy of the law to prevent intimidation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The adequacy of the law in this respect is being considered in the context of the review of the Public Order Act 1936 and related legislation.

Isle of Man and Channel Islands

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the cost of maintaining his Department's dealings with the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands; and whether the islands make any contribution to these costs.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The cost of the section dealing with islands' matters in 1983-84 was £244,500 including overheads and common services. These costs are met by the United Kingdom Government except to the extent that they include the Home Office role in the discharge of the Government's responsibility for the islands' defence and external relations, to which a contribution is made by the Isle of Man.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will explain the procedure through which the United Kingdom exercises its responsibilities toward the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man in cases of foreign and international representation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The United Kingdom Government are responsible for the islands' international relations. The relevant United Kingdom Government Departments represent the islands' interests in international negotiations and the islands' authorities are advised and consulted, through the Home Office, as necessary. In addition, the facilities of United Kingdom posts abroad are available to British citizens from the islands.

EMPLOYMENT

Unemployment

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what representations have been made to him by the Trades Union Congress on unemployment;

(2) what plans he has for reducing unemployment.

Mr. Alan Clark: We have received no recent specific representations from the Trades Union Congress on the question of unemployment.

Some 689,000 people are benefiting from our employment and training measures designed to alleviate the impact of unemployment on those most affected. However, sustainable employment depends on a healthy economy and competitive industry. Our policies are directed to this end, and we continue to look for ways of building on what has been achieved so far. One important influence on firms' competitiveness is the level of wages, and the Government believes that moderating the growth in real earnings will have a significant impact on unemployment.

Wages Councils

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement of his policy on the future of wages councils.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Government have as yet made no decision on the future of the wages councils. It is carefully considering all available evidence and opinion on their operation and effects.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will list the level of unemployment in the Official Report in the city of Manchester on (a) a constituency level and (b) a ward basis at the latest date;

(2) if he will list the percentage of unemployment in the constituencies within the Merseyside special development area on (a) a constituency basis and (b) a ward basis at the latest date for which figures are available;

(3) if he will list the level of unemployment in each London borough on (a) a constituency basis and (b) a ward basis at the latest date; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will list the level of unemployment in the city of Liverpool on (a) a constituency basis and (b) on a ward basis at the latest date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Unemployment totals for parliamentary constituencies and local authority districts are now available in the House of Commons Library. Unemployment rates are available only for travel-to-work areas and for counties. The new system to compile figures by electoral wards is not fully developed, and unemployment data for individual wards will be made available from about the middle of next year.

Labour Mobility

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Employment what assistance his Department provides to people moving from one part of the country to another for the purpose of taking up employment; whether he proposes any changes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission provides financial assistance under the employment transfer scheme to help and encourage unemployed people to move home permanently to take up employment. The main aim of the scheme is to help to fill vacancies which employers have tried and failed to fill with suitable local unemployed people.

A review of the scheme has recently been undertaken by officials of the Manpower Services Commission and the Department of Employment. This has led to proposals to improve the scheme's cost-effectiveness and simplify its rules which are currently being considered by the commission.

Disabled People

Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Employment when the Manpower Services Commission's code of good practice on the employment of disabled people will be issued; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Manpower Services Commission's "Code of Good Practice on the Employment of Disabled People" is being published today and is being formally launched at a reception for winners of the fit for work awards scheme, at which the Prime Minister is guest of honour. Copies of the code have been placed in the Library.

The code was prepared by the commission in response to a request in July 1982 by the Government for a code of good practice in the employment of disabled people for use on a voluntary basis. It has been prepared in consultation with a wide range of interested organisations including those representing employers, trade unions and the interests of disabled people. In its final form it has been unanimously approved by the Commission and endorsed by the National Advisory Council on the Employment of Disabled People, which advises both the commission and the Secretary of State for Employment. We also welcome the endorsement of the TUC and CBI.

The code sets out for the first time in a comprehensive form standards which employers should adopt in employing disabled people and provides practical advice and information to help them meet those standards. It also recognises the role others, notably employees and their representatives, have to play, and there is a special section addressed to them.

The Government welcome and endorse the code. We believe that it represents an important and practical tool for ensuring that the abilities of disabled people are more fully recognised and their potential at work properly fulfilled. I hope that Members on both sides of the House will give their full support to the code and that the guidance it gives will be widely adopted.

ENERGY

Intellectual Property Rights

Mr. Eggar asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps have been taken to manage the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority's intellectual property rights under the European fast reactor collaboration.

Mr. Peter Walker: On 9 October the UK Atomic Energy Authority and the National Nuclear Corporation formed a company, Fast Reactor Technology Limited (FASTEC), to manage the commercial use of the technology generated by them in relation to the research, design and development of fast reactors under the European collaboration. The NNC holds 51 per cent. of the authorised share capital and the UKAEA holds 49 per cent.

NATIONAL FINANCE

European Community Budget

73. Mr. Maxton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied that all possible savings have been made in the 1984 Community budget.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Yes.

Value Added Tax (Deregistration)

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many registered traders applied for deregistration for value added tax purposes in each quarter in 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Hayhoe: only the number of actual deregistrations from VAT is centrally recorded. The figures are as follows:

From 20 October 1983 to 2 February 1983—36,741 deregistrations.
From 3 February 1983 to 23 May 1983—40,767 deregistrations.
From 24 May 1983 to 19 July 1983—35,114 deregistrations.
From 20 July 1983 to 12 October 1983—37,380 deregistrations.
From 13 October 1983 to 3 January 1984—33,928 deregistrations.
From 4 January 1984 to 2 April 1984—42,913 deregistrations.
From 3 April 1984 to 3 July 1984—36,502 deregistrations.
From 4 July 1984 to 2 October 1984—37,314 deregistrations.

Books (VAT)

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to introduce value added tax on books; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 30 October to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) at column 944.

Interest Rates

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the real interest rate, being the minimum lending rate less inflation, prevailing in October 1975, October 1978, October 1980, October 1981, October 1982, October 1983, and October 1984.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Information on the minimum lending rate is to be found on page 192 of the annual supplement to Economic Trends and information on prices on pages 114-117 of the same publication, although the hon. Member should be aware that from 20 August 1981 the Bank of England suspended the announcement of minimum lending rate. An article in the December 1983 Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin discusses some of the problems involved in measuring real rates of interest and shows recent trends.

Capital Gains Tax Retirement Relief

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the cost of extending capital gains tax retirement relief to self-employed people who have to cease work on account of illness or disability if the criterion used was (a) receipt of invalidity benefit or (b) receipt of attendance allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: I regret that the information necessary to provide a reliable estimate of the cost of extending capital gains tax retirement relief in the ways suggested is not available.

Unemployment (Cost)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out in tabular form his best estimate of the average monthly cost to the Exchequer when an adult male worker on average weekly earnings, on the basis of all industries and services covered by the new earnings survey, updated by the average earnings' index and assuming pay was not affected by absence, becomes unemployed, showing separately (a) for single men and (b) for a married man with two children, one aged under five and the other aged between five and 10, the following disbursements: (i) unemployment benefit, (ii) supplementary benefit, (iii) income tax rebate, (iv) housing benefit and the following losses of revenue, (v) from income tax, (vi) from taxes on consumption of goods and services, (vii) from employer's national insurance contributions and from employee's national insurance contributions.

Mr. Peter Rees: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Oil (Gross Domestic Product Earnings)

Mr. Wilson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will incorporate the gross domestic product earnings from oil produced in the Scottish sector of the North sea as determined under the Continental Shelf Jurisdiction Order 1968 into Scottish gross domestic product figures given in official publications.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 13 November 1984, column 164]: It would not be appropriate to allocate the gross domestic product of the North sea to regions of the United Kingdom.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Leeward Islands

49. Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is satisfied that the Commission's decision to refuse to finance Leeward Islands Air Transport's purchase of four British Aerospace super748s was taken according to normal EEC procedures.

Mr. Raison: The Commission has not made any final decision on financing the super748s. I understand the airline submitted new evidence to the Commission on 7 November. I am confident that this will be reviewed carefully and the decisions taken in accordance with normal EC procedures.

Ethiopia

50. Mr. Geoffrey Robinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a timetable of the official requests received by his Department for aid to the famine in Ethiopia and the responses made by his Department.

Mr. Raison: Two such appeals have been made this year by the Ethiopian Government, but there have been others by international agencies.

On 30 March 1984 the Ethiopian Government appealed to all donors for drought relief aid. The full report reached my Administration on 27 April. The donors had sought detailed clarification on certain points through the United Nations resident co-ordinator and the answers to these were given at a meeting on 4 June. We then supported European Community decisions to provide 18,000 tonnes of cereals (7 June), and 1,900 tonnes of dairy products (10 July).

On 17 April the Community had already decided to provide emergency aid of 2·5 million ecus. On 22 May we told the Ethiopian Relief and Rehabilitation Commissioner that, following earlier help, a further £300,000 was being given to various British voluntary agencies to support their relief operation.

In response to the International Committee of the Red Cross and League of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies' 1984 appeals for drought stricken African countries, including Ethiopia, we had already made grants of £2 million and £1 million respectively. In July and June we received revised appeals from each organisation. On 30 July we announced further contributions to these appeals of £150,000 and £350,000 respectively. the same day we announced allocations of 2,000 tonnes British food aid for the voluntary agencies' work in Ethiopia, and £1 million for the Disasters Emergency Appeal "Famine in Africa". We also indicated that we would urge the World Food Programme to give Ethiopia part of the British contribution to the programme, and 15,000 tonnes have now been so allocated.

On 20 July we received a UNICEF appeal for help to mothers and children in 13 drought-stricken African countries including Ethiopia. We responded to this on 7 August with a gift of £1 million.

On 21 September the Ethiopian authorities issued a second appeal to all donors. On 17 September the European Community had already allotted another 3 million ecus in emergency assistance. On 4 October we agreed to provide another 3,000 tonnes of cereals through British voluntary agencies. On 17 October the Community agreed to provide another 35,000 tonnes of cereals and 1,300 tonnes of edible oil and dairy products. I announced our further aid decisions on 24 October, and at our urging the European Community Council of Ministers agreed on extensive additional help on 6 November.

51. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he is satisfied with the action taken by the EEC in providing emergency aid to Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: Yes, so far. The European Community has provided food, development and emergency aid to Ethiopia on a substantial scale this year. The need now is to reach early agreement on the 1985 food aid programme and on further emergency assistance from the European development fund.

52. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about recent discussions with the Ethiopian Government about food aid and other matters.

Mr. Raison: Our ambassador and his staff in Addis Ababa are in constant touch with the Ethiopian authorities. I myself saw the Ethiopian Commissioner for Relief and Rehabilitation, Mr. Dawit Wolde-Giorgis, on 7 November. We then reviewed what Her Majesty's Government, together with the European Community and other countries and agencies, are now doing to help relieve the famine in Ethiopia.

53. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps have been taken by the Council of Ministers to help alleviate the consequences of the present famine in Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: The Council of Ministers endorsed on 6 November plans to provide food and other emergency aid worth approximately £35 million for Africa, much of which will go to Ethiopia. Before this £11·6 million had been spent by the European Community on food aid, including 53,000 tonnes of cereals, to Ethiopia in 1984 in addition to development projects financed from the European development fund.

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to seek to secure United Nations observers to station themselves in Ethiopia to ensure that food aid reaches the starving civilian population and is not diverted to other recipients.

Mr. Raison: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made representations to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for better aid co-ordination. Last week he appointed a UN co-ordinator for international relief aid to Ethiopia. The UN agencies concerned, and the voluntary agencies, work closely with the Ethiopian Government in expediting the transport of food to the people who need it. We have said that we are ready to provide further help to reinforce their monitoring work if this is required.

UNESCO

54. Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will refrain from reaching a final decision on the issue of the United Kingdom's continuing membership of UNESCO until the House has had an opportunity to consider the matter.

Mr. Raison: I have already said that the Government will take into consideration the views expressed by hon. Members in reaching a decision on continued membership of UNESCO. The possible use of parliamentary time for this purpose is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will specify the proportion of the £6·8 million Overseas Development Administration roading contract in the Falkland Islands attributable to (a) roads in Port Stanley and the cost per metre of constructing these and (b) the road from Port Stanley to the Port Stanley airport; and what proceedings are being contemplated against the contractor, in view of the break-up of this road immediately after its opening.

Mr. Raison: Of the £6·8 million, £3·2 million was spent on Stanley town roads and £2·9 million on the airport road.

The cost per metre for the Stanley roads was £667 inclusive of fixed assets. I am advised that it is unlikely that contractual liability for the damage to the airport road could be shown.

TRANSPORT

Local Authorities (Transport Policies and Programmes)

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report, for each local authority in England, the following information from their transport policies and programmes submissions: (a) expenditure bid for 1984-85, (b) accepted expenditure for 1984-85, (c) latest forecast of outturn expenditure for 1984-85, and (d) expenditure bid for 1985-86 for (i) highway capital expenditure (distinguishing for 1985-86 that part of bid which will be eligible for transport supplementary grant), (ii) public transport capital expenditure, (iii) highway maintenance expenditure, and (iv) public transport revenue support expenditure, showing in each case the total for England as a whole.

Mrs. Chalker: This information is given in the following tables. The breakdown of accepted capital expenditure between highways and public transport is based on the councils' priorities as stated in their 1984-85 transport policies and programmes.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he or his officials have had with nationalised transport industries regarding the seeking of injunctions by the industries against secondary picketing of their installations in the current miners' dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have naturally been kept in close touch, by the chairmen of nationalised transport industries, with issues arising from the miners' dispute. The Government have made it clear that they would not wish to discourage any employers from using the legal remedies which are available to them as a result of the employment legislation. Action under these provisions must, however, be a judgment for individual managements.

Public Service Vehicle Test

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport how the failure of vehicles owned by (a) the National Bus Company and (b) municipal transport undertakings compare with other operators in the annual public service vehicle test.

Mrs. Chalker: Statistics are based on five types of operator; details, which cover England, Scotland and Wales ar as follows for the last complete year 1984-84:

	National Bus Co	Local authority vehicles (inc PTEs)	Scottish Bus Grp	London Transport	Private
Number Tested	14,173	14,415	3,105	4,965	28,634
Number Failed	1,691	2,29	677	562	8,766
Percentage failed	11·93	15·60	21·80	11·32	30·61

M1-M6 (Lighting)

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Transport what present plans he has for lighting those sections of the M1 and M6 motorways currently unlit; and whether he will estimate the cost of providing full lighting along the complete lengths of these routes.

Mrs. Chalker: Lighting is planned to be installed on the M1 between Newport Pagnell service area and junction 16.

The estimated cost of providing lighting on the unlit lengths of the M1 and M6 motorways would be approximately £9 million and £13·5 million, respectively, at 1982-83 prices.

Falling Objects (Unidentified Aircraft)

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to provide for compensation to be paid in respect of damage or injury caused by objects falling from unidentified aircraft.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No. Air transport operators are absolutely liable for damage or injury caused to persons or property on the ground caused by objects falling from aircraft. I do not consider that legislation is necessary. Incidents are relatively infrequent and in the few cases where the aircraft cannot be traced financial compensation can be obtained under normal household and personal accident insurance policies. I see no justification for creating a scheme to investigate, assess and pay out claims when suitable resources and expertise are already available on the commercial market.

Mr. J. T. Beasley

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the relevant employment experience or professional qualifications in respect of public transport which he took into account when appointing Mr. J. T. Beasley to the board of London Regional Transport with a responsibility for bus services.

Mrs. Chalker: The qualifications for appointment to the board of London Regional Transport are specified in schedule 1 to the London Regional Transport Act 1984. Mr. Telford Beasley has an impressive record of achievement in his career to date, and my right hon. Friend is in no doubt that his qualifications and experience are those required to run a business with expenditure of £435 million and some 30,000 staff.

Cross-Channel Link

Mr. Parris asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the cross-Channel link.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Government's position remains as stated in my right hon. Friend's reply to the questions by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir J. Wells) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) on 22 May 1984, at column 380.

Mr. Parris asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had regarding the Channel tunnel project since the publication of the Banks Report in May.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend has had numerous discussions with promoting groups and with financial institutions interested in carrying forward one or other of the various proposals for a Channel fixed link.

Mr. Parris asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he next plans to raise the cross-Channel link with his French counterpart.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend will discuss this with his French counterpart on 14 November.

Brampton Bypass

Mr. Maclean asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will report on the progress made over the last 12 months on preparing the scheme for the Brampton bypass; and whether he expects to be able to publish a preferred route by January 1985.

Mrs. Chalker: We have been considering in detail the options north and south of the town which I announced in October 1983, along with some variations suggested during our consultations with local councils and other statutory bodies. These somewhat complex studies will not be finished in time for me to make an announcement about the route in January, but I certainly hope to do this within the next few months.

Level Crossings (Pedestrian Safety)

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has completed his consideration of the report of the committee of inquiry into pedestrian safety at public road level crossings; and what conclusions he has reached.

Mr. David Mitchell: Consultations on the committee's report have now been completed. The committee's main conclusions have been widely welcomed and endorsed. This is a well-deserved tribute to the work of my right hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mrs. Oppenheim) and the members of her committee.

The committee reached three main conclusions. First, it concluded that, subject to the qualifications set out in the committee's report, automatic crossings are no less safe for pedestrians than the gated crossings they replace. Second, the committee was clear that insufficient weight has been placed in the past on the natural concern created by automation. It concluded that a much more determined effort will need to be made by British Railways to involve local people at the formative stage of a modernisation proposal. Third, the committee concluded that the present guidelines and criteria which apply to modernisation proposals make inadequate provision for pedestrians. A clearer set of principles and guidelines should determine these provisions. Pedestrians should be provided with more space, clearer separation and increased physical protection from rail and road traffic as traffic levels increase.

I fully accept these conclusions. They provide the necessary reassurance and preconditions for British Rail to proceed with the modernisation of level crossings and thus help to safeguard the future of many local railways lines.

The committee also produced 16 detailed recommendations and guidelines. The consultations indicated considerable support for the spirit of these recommendations but disagreement with some of the specific proposals. It is legitimate that there should be differences of opinion on matters of technical detail, and I have concluded that the right course for the future is to be guided by the spirit of the recommendations while taking account of all the comments we have received on them.

I have accordingly asked the railway inspectorate to review the published "Railway Construction and Operation Requirements for Level Crossings", taking account of the committee's report and the comments made on it. The result will be revised criteria and guidelines to safeguard pedestrians at level crossings. I have asked the inspectorate to give particular consideration to the needs of disabled people. In revising the requirements, the inspectorate will also be reviewing the present arrangements for keeping records of accidents at level crossings; ensuring that distinctive general warning signs are used; standardising audible warnings at new automatic crossings; and establishing technical criteria for the appropriate form of protection to be provided at crossings in different circumstances. My Department will also be writing to highway authorities asking for their co-operation with British Rail where this is appropriate. I shall be discussing with the British Railways Board its proposals for improving its arrangements for consultation and publicity.

Finally, I wish to emphasise the Government's gratitude to the committee for its full, timely and thorough report.

SCOTLAND

Teachers (Salaries)

68. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will be making a decision on the establishment of an independent review on Teachers' Salaries.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 9 November 1984 at column 11, to my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie).

Job Creation

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will categorise the number of new jobs created in Scotland in the latest year as follows: (a) filled by full-time male employees, (b) filled by part-time male employees, (c) filled by full-time female employees and (d) filled by part-time female employees.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This information is not available. However, in the year to 31 October 1984, 15,007 new jobs were associated with offers of selective financial assistance under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 for projects in Scotland.

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will categorise the number of new jobs created in Dundee in the latest year as filled by the following: (a) full-time male employees, (b) part-time male employees, (c) full-time female employees and (d) part-time female employees.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This information is not available. However, in the year to 31 October 1984, 530 new jobs were associated with offers of selective financial assistance under section 7 of the Industrial Development Act 1982 for projects in Dundee.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information his Department has on the incidence of cervical cancer in Scotland in the past three years.

Mr. John MacKay: Information about the incidence of this disease is not available centrally. However, the number of cases of cancer of the cervix is given in section 3(10) of the "Scottish Health Statistics 1982" and section 3(5) of the "Advance Tables, June 1984", both of which are in the Library.

School Meals

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the current qualifying limits for receipt of free school meals in each education authority; and if he has been informed of any anticipated change in 1984-85.

Mr. Allan Stewart: All education authorities have a statutory duty to provide free school meals for pupils whose families are in receipt of supplementary benefit or family income supplement. The following authorities are also currently awarding free meals to some children on the basis of their family's income:

Maximum qualifying income for a family with one child

Education authority	£
Central	69·30
Fife	65·14
Strathclyde	65·35
Orkney	53·65
Shetlands	61·83
Western Isles	88·50

In addition, Dumfries and Galloway take family income into account when considering appeals relating to the provision of free school meals.

In 1984, only Borders regional council used receipt of unemployment benefit as an additional qualification for school meals.

Grampian, Highland and Tayside regions also provide free school meals to pupils whose families are in receipt of housing benefit supplement.

I am not aware of any proposed changes in these arrangements.

Roads

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of kilometers of motorway (a) in use (b) under construction and (c) planned but not under construction on 1 November for the years 1983 and 1984.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is as follows:

Motorway in Scotland: km.

	In use	Under Construction	Planned
1 November 1983	236	—	64
1 November 1984	236	12	52

Labour Statistics

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list the level of unemployment in the city of Edinburgh on (a) a constituency basis and (b) a ward basis at the latest date;

(2) if he will give the percentage of unemployment in the cities of Glasgow and Edinburgh on (a) a constituency basis and (b) a ward basis at the latest date;

(3) if he will list the level of unemployment in the city of Glasgow on (a) a constituency basis and (b) a ward basis at the latest date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Unemployment rates are calculated only for regions in Scotland and travel-to-work areas. Together with unemployment totals by constituency, these figures are now available in the House of Commons Library. Individual ward totals will be made available from mid-1985.

NHS (Pay Beds)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many private beds are available in National Health Service hospitals in Scotland; what percentage of health service beds this figure represents; and what was the income from these beds in the financial year 1983-84.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is as follows:

	Beds
Number of authorised private beds	109
National Health Service bed complement, Scotland	60,000
Percentage of private beds to National Health Service beds, Scotland	0·18
Income from private beds 1983-84	£950,280

Government Forensic Service

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the names and positions of the Government forensic experts and former employees of the Government forensic service who gave evidence in the John Preece appeal case.

Mr. Younger: The following members of the Home Office forensic science service gave evidence when Mr.

John Preece's case was referred by me to the High Court of Justiciary in terms of section 263(1)(a) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975: the appointments shown were those held at the time of the hearing in June 1981. No other Government forensic experts or former employees gave evidence at the hearing.

Dr. A. S. Curry
Controller Home Office Forensic Science Service (now retired)
Mr. S. S. Kind
Director Home Office Forensic Science Service Central Research Establishment
Miss Margaret Pereira
Director Regional Forensic Science Laboratory, Chepstow (now Controller of the Home Office Forensic Science Service)
Mr. J. L. Fish
Director Regional Forensic Science Laboratory, Birmingham
Dr. A. Clift
Principal Scientific Officer Regional Forensic Science Laboratory, Birmingham
Dr. R. P. G. Gregory
Principal Scientific Officer Regional Forensic Science Laboratory, Weatherby

Dr. Alan Clift

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library the report prepared by Dr. Clift for the Scottish appeal case of John Preece.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have been asked to reply.

Full information on the matters of interest to the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) was given in a written reply on 28 February 1984, at column 134. However, I will arrange for copies of the three reports by Dr. Clift which were lodged as productions in the trial in 1973 of John Preece to be placed in the Library.

New Town Development Corporations

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what conclusions he has reached about the appropriate timing of wind-up of each of the Scottish new town development corporations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: I announced my conclusions about the future of the Scottish new towns on 23 July 1982, at columns 313-14. I made it clear then that I considered the new towns, administered by the development corporations, to have been highly successful in contributing to the general economic growth and increased employment opportunities of all kinds, and that they continued to have considerable potential in their role of stimulating employment and underpinning the economy as a whole. I also referred, however, to the need to make advance provision for the winding-up arrangements which would commence as a development corporation's task neared completion and to my decision that wind-up should begin when a specified percentage for a new town's designated population had been reached. To help assess the appropriate percentages for each town, each development corporation was invited to draw up and submit a detailed development profile setting out what tasks it considered it had still to carry out before its task was complete, together with proposed programmes to achieve this.

The five Scottish new towns have completed and submitted their development profiles. These were circulated to the regional and district councils within which each new town is situated and they were given an opportunity to comment. I have considered the profiles and the comments submitted, separately and carefully. There is no doubt that the preparation of these documents has been a valuable exercise for all concerned, involving a detailed review of the achievements, resources, and remaining objectives of the corporations, together with an assessment of how best to achieve these remaining objectives.

I made it clear in 1982 that I did not expect any new town development corporations to be wound up before the end of the 1980s. I have adhered to that view.

I have come to the conclusion that the new towns should begin the winding-up process, which I envisage would take up to five years, when the following percentages of their existing designated populations are reached:

Town	Trigger per cent.	Designated population	Population at trigger per cent.	Present population
East Kilbride	90	82,500	74,250	70,600
Glenrothes	79	55,000	43,000	36,750
Cumbernauld	77	70,000	54,000	49,500
Livingston	71	70,000	49,500	39,200
Irvine	66	95,000	63,000	56,400

The dates on which these triggers are likely to be reached cannot, of course, be predicted with complete certainty, but no development corporation is likely to achieve its trigger percentage until around 1990. In order that the development corporations may plan for the effective completion of their remaining tasks, I have decided that no corporation should begin wind-up before 1 April 1990, even if its populations percentage trigger is reached earlier. The percentages I have quoted above are broadly consistent with the new towns commencing wind-up at different dates in the 1990s. In view of the difficulties of predicting demographic trends, I intend to review the percentages and probable timing for all the towns five years from now—1989.

I consider that the Scottish new town development corporations have been highly effective in providing the sort of environment in which both domestic and overseas industries can flourish. They have been particularly successful in recent years in attracting the new high technology industries to Scotland and in providing growing employment in the industries of the future. They have an important and continuing role to play, not least in the continuing attraction of mobile investment projects to Scotland, and in making a major contribution to their respective regional and national economies, all while pursuing the task of creating fully developed and balanced communities.

I hope that this statement will remove any lingering uncertainty about the development corporations' future role or prospects. The Scottish development corporations will continue to do a good job and to enjoy the full support of this Government.

Housing Defects Act 1984

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make a statement about the implementation in Scotland of the scheme of assistance for private owners of prefabricated reinforced concrete houses under the Housing Defects Act 1984.

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Construction, in his reply to his hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) and the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) on Monday 12 November, at columns 133-34, confirmed that the Housing Defects Act 1984 would come into effect in Great Britain on 1 December 1984.

I have by virtue of the Housing Defects (Prefabricated Reinforced Concrete Dwellings) (Scotland) Designations 1984, made on 2 November 1984, designated for the purposes of the scheme of assistance in Scotland the following classes of building, as described in the designations:

Ayrshire County Council (Lindsay)*
Blackburn Orlit*
Boot
Dorran
Myton-Clyde
Orlit
Tarran
Tarran-Clyde
Tee Beam*
Unitroy*
Whitson-Fairhurst*
Winget

* These are types found only in Scotland. Myton-Clyde is the Scottish equivalent of the Myton in England.

There will be a 10-year period from 1 December 1984 within which owners may apply for assistance. In common with England and Wales, there will be an expenditure limit, for the purpose of calculating the amount of reinstatement grant payable in each case, of £14,000 for all types of defective dwelling under the Act. There will also be a common cut-off date, by which an owner must normally have bought his or her dwelling in order to be eligible for assistance under the Act, of 26 April 1984 for all classes of building.

A circular is to be issued shortly to all housing authorities in Scotland about the Act and the scheme of assistance for owners of prefabricated reinforced concrete dwellings.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Authorities (Expenditure Targets)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list those local authorities whose provisional expenditure targets for 1985-86 have been increased by 5 per cent. or more, by 10 per cent. or more, by 15 per cent. or more and by 20 per cent. or more, showing for each authority the percentage overspend or underspend on target and on grant related expenditure budgeted in 1984-85;

(2) if he will publish a list of the 10 authorities, excluding non-metropolitan districts, with the smallest increase, or largest decrease, in their expenditure target between (a) 1984-85 and 1985-86 and (b) 1982-83 and 1985-86;

(3) if he will publish a list of the top 10 authorities, excluding non-metropolitan districts, in terms of the interest in their expenditure target between (a) 1984-85 and 1985-86 and (b) 1982-83 and 1985-86.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have placed the information in the House Library.

Rate Support Grant

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total payment of rate support grant in each year from 1981-82 to 1984-85.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The information for local authorities in England is as follows:

*Rate Support Grants

	£ million
1981-82	9,035
1982-83	9,013
1983-84	9,082
1984-85	8,841

* Rate Support Grants = Domestic rate relief grant (as given in rate support grant settlement) + Block grant (as reported by local authorities. 1981-82 and 1982-83 figures based on outturn, 1983-84 on revised estimates and 1984-85 on budgets).

Specific and Supplementary Grants

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total payment of specific and supplementary grants in each year from 1981-82 to 1984-85.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The information for local authorities in England is as follows:

*Specicific and Supplementary Grants

	£ million
1981-82	1,930
1982-83	2,223
1983-84	2,435
1984-85	2,629

* Specific and supplementary grants defined as relevant for rate support grant purposes and as reported by local authorities. 1981-82 and 1982-83 figures based on outturn, 1983-84 on revised estimates and 1984-85 on budgets.

Local Authorities (Fees and Charges Income)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total local authority income from fees and charges in each year from 1981-82 to 1984-85.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The available information for English local authorities is as follows:

Fees and charges on rate fund services	£ million
1981-82	1,830
1982-83	1,955

The information is derived from local authorities' outturn forms which are not yet available for 1983-84 and 1984-85.

Beaches (Pollution)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will introduce legislation to seek to restrict pollution of British beaches not currently covered by Community legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Since July 1984 all new discharges of effluent to coastal and estuarial waters have required consent under Part II of the Control of Pollution Act, 1974. The Government have announced their intention to make regulations extending this control to all such discharges begun prior to that date. In addition, under the international convention for the prevention of pollution from ships (MARPOL), the discharge of oil from ships is totally prohibited within 12 miles of the coast, and at greater distances is strictly controlled.

Gipsies

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will consider introducing legislation to relax the provisions relating to the eviction of gipsies;

(2) if he will introduce legislation to facilitate the eviction of gipsies.

Mr. Macfarlane: The specific powers of eviction applicable to gipsies are those available when an area is designated under section 12 of the Caravan Sites Act 1968. In general these can be obtained when my right hon. Friend can be satisfied that adequate provision is made for the accommodation of gipsies in the area to be designated. Measures we introduced in 1980 simplified the eviction procedures and established a system of Exchequer capital grants to help authorities to provide sites. I have no current plans for further amendments.

Questions regarding trespass in general are matters for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Planning Applications

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning applications are now outstanding in his Department; what is the longest period that an application has awaited his decision; how many have been outstanding more than (a) three months, (b) six months, (c) nine months and (d) 12 months and over; and what steps he is taking to speed up the decision-making process.

Mr. Macfarlane: Planning applications are made to the local planning authority and there is a right of appeal to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. At the end of September 1984 the Department had 7,893 appeals in hand, of which 214 were in abeyance at the request of the parties. The breakdown of the remaining cases is as follows:

	Number
(a) Over 3 months old	4,054
(b) Over 6 months old	1,512
(c) Over 9 months old	581
(d) Over 12 months old	372

The Department does not keep records of the longest period that an appeal has awaited a decision. Some cases are delayed with the agreement of both parties pending the resolution of issues such as structure plan policies.

Additional resources are already being provided to deal with the rising number of appeals.

Brixton Cares for Kids

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if payment of inner city partnership grants to Brixton Cares for Kids has been terminated; how much grant has been paid; and what lessons are to be drawn from his Department's experience with this project.

Sir George Young: Payment of urban programme grant to Brixton Cares for Kids, a project which has, until recently, run successfully, was terminated when the group decided to dissolve earlier this year. The amount of grant paid up to the date of termination was:

Capital:	46,724
Revenue:
1982-83	25,830
1983-84	44,690
1984-85	11,000

An inquiry into the project has been held by Lambeth council's social services directorate and the result of this is expected shortly. Until the inquiry has been completed, it would be inappropriate to comment further.

Tenants Charter

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the number of local authorities which specifically maintain lists available to the public of their tenants who are prepared to take advantage of the provisions of the tenants charter by sub-letting.

Sir George Young: My Department does not hold such information.

Housing Grants

Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to publish a consultative document on the future of housing repair and improvement grants; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Wales hope to issue a consultation document on private sector home improvement policy shortly.

Home Insulation

Mr. Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report figures showing in constant prices expenditure by local authorities on insulation of their housing stock for each of the last five years; and if he is satisfied that the inclusion of grants for such expenditure in the general allocation has not resulted in a fall in expenditure.

Sir George Young: Expenditure by English local authorities on their own stock in specific energy conservation schemes is estimated to be:—

	£ million 1983-84 cost terms
1979-80	43·8
1980-81	16·8
1981-82	13·1
1982-83	21·7
1983-84*	17·1

*Revised

Progress remains on average ahead of the original target of 200,000 dwellings to be insulated per annum. Expenditure on insulation incurred as part of more general improvement, conversion or repair work is not included.

Local Government Expenditure

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what criteria he intends using to determine which groups are genuine voluntary sector groups for the purposes of approving funding under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 and the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984;

(2) by what criteria he will determine that it would not be expedient for a metropolitan county council to incur expenditure under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 as a result of fresh commitments entered into after 26 June which would fall due from 1 April 1985.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Each application for my consent to expenditure under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 is considered on its merits in the light of all relevant considerations.

Local Government Reform

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent response he has received from the Association of Metropolitan Authorities concerning the Government's plans for planning functions in metropolitan county areas in the event that the metropolitan county councils are abolished.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: None, since the response, in January 1984, to the "Streamlining the Cities" White Paper (Cmnd. 9063).

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what estimate he has made of the expected staffing implications for his Department of the expenditure controls which he introduced in the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act;

(2) if he has taken any steps to determine what staff resources he will require to carry out work arising in his Department from the control of general expenditure powers, the control of disposals of land and the control of contracts arising from the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council.

(3) what is the amount of his Department's voted provision in the current financial year and in 1985-86 to cover the cost of work associated with carrying out the control of general expenditure powers, the control of disposals of land and the control of contracts arising from the metropolitan county councils and the Greater London council.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: Enough staff will be employed to ensure that applications for specific consent are dealt with expeditiously, but the numbers required will depend upon decisions of the authorities concerned, and on the scope of consents of a general nature that are issued under the legislation. The cost will be met from within the Department's voted provision for the current financial year. The Department will be seeking appropriate provision for 1985-86.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate the Government made, and on what basis, of the likely expenditure and manpower consequences of their proposals before publishing Cmnd. 9063.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: No detailed estimates were made because the financial and manpower implications of abolition will depend largely on decisions yet to be taken by successor authorities.

I will be publishing our latest estimates very shortly.

Local Government (Manpower)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had and what representations he has received from civil service trade unions about the manpower implications of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The departmental trade union side has been fully informed at all stages of the staffing arrangements required to administer the provisions of the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act. No specific representations on this issue have been made.

Grant-related Expenditure

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all those authorities whose grant-related expenditure in 1984-85 exceeds their expenditure target, showing the respective figures for each authority.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have placed the information in the House Library.

Private Flats (London)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many households there are in privately owned blocks of flats built before 1 July 1948 in Westminster, Camden and Kensington and Chelsea.

Sir George Young: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested. The numbers of households accommodated in privately rented or owner occupied purpose built flats constructed before 1940 as estimated from the "National Dwelling and Housing Survey 1977" were 10,800 in Westminster with a further 3,200 age unrecorded and 9,300 in Kensington and Chelsea with a further 1,200 age unrecorded. In Camden, the age of the building was unrecorded for virtually all properties.

Regional Water Authorities

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will give details of the code of practice formulated between his Department, the Water Authorities Association and the Guild of British Newspaper Editors regarding publicity for the meetings of regional water authorities and their committees.

Mr. Macfarlane: I am sending to my hon. Friend a copy of the Code which water authority chairmen drew up in consultation with the Guild and which Ministers endorsed.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the extent to which regional water authorities are now publishing material about items to be discussed at meetings of each authority and its committees and holding press conferences after such meetings.

Mr. Macfarlane: These matters are provided for in the code of practice which water authority chairmen have drawn up in consultation with the Guild of British Newspaper Editors.

Its detailed operation is a matter for the authorities themselves as independent statutory bodies. I understand, however, that they are adhering to it.

General Development Order (Planning Controls)

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes concerning planning controls on agricultural buildings and farm roads Her Majesty's Government intend to propose or make in the current revision of the general development order.

Mr. Macfarlane: I am considering the wide-ranging responses to our consultation paper on a number of possible changes to the General Development Order. Since issuing that consultation paper a report by the Countryside Commission on the future of the uplands has called for tighter planning controls over farm roads, and so on in upland areas. The recommendations in that report are also under consideration.

Planning Inspectors

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will categorise the career backgrounds of planning inspectors appointed to his Department in each of the last five years, as between those with previous experience of planning and related matters, and those with none; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: All planning inspectors appointed to my Department over the last five years had experience of planning or related matters.

Candidates for appointment as inspector must have had prior experience of the planning or housing Acts or have served in a senior administrative or managerial post requiring knowledge of judicial or quasi-judicial procedures.

Candidates for appointment as senior inspector must have had direct experience at a responsible level of the preparation and implementation of development plans and of development control.

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out in the Official Report the number of planning inspectors in his Department and the number of planning appeals dealt with in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Macfarlane: During the past five years the number of full-time Inspectors on 1 July was as follows:

Year	Number
1979	203
1980	193
1981	190
1982	184
1983	174
1984	176

The number of section 36 appeals dealt with are as follows:

Year	Received	Decided
1979	12,990	8,933
1980	16,208	13,130
1981	16,637	14,451
1982	13,900	12,915
1983	13,699	11,221

At the moment there are 173 Inspectors and during the first three quarters of this year 11,453 appeals have been received and 8,743 decided.

A recruitment competition to replace expected retirements and to increase the complement of inspectors by seven is currently under way.

A panel of part-time fee-paid inspectors, at present numbering 81, assists the inspectorate with its section 36 casework. The number of Inspectors on the panel varies considerably and details of the numbers in former years is not readily available.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Computer Services (West Midlands)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many administrative staff have been specifically employed either as research assistants or computer programmers on the West Midlands regional health authority's computer services for each year since 1979 to the latest available date.

Mr. John Patten: Information such as my hon. Friend seeks is not collected centrally. He may wish to write to the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority, which may be able to let him have the required information.

Benefits (Dundee)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total value of the successful claims to benefit during the welfare benefits take-up campaign in Dundee in April.

Mr. Whitney: The total value of successful claims to benefit during the welfare benefits take-up campaign in Dundee in April was as follows:

Increase in weekly amount paid to new and existing beneficaries	1726·25
One-off payments	12,639·18

Funeral Expenses

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information his Department has on the average cost of funeral expenses in the past three years.

Mr. Whitney: Information on funeral expenses is not collected by the Department, but I understand that the cost of a funeral varies widely in the range of £350 to £650.

Blind Persons

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will estimate the number of registered blind persons in receipt of mobility, invalidity or attendance allowances who are not suffering from a second disability in addition to blindness.

Mr. Newton: I regret that estimates cannot be provided in the form requested.

The latest information available shows that some 13,600 people with a visual impairment qualify for attendance allowance; some 3,000 people suffering from blindness or low vision qualify for contributory invalidity pension; and some 1,200 people with disorders of the eye qualify for non-contributory invalidity pension. Similar information is not available for mobility allowance. It is not known how many of those included in the figures above are registered blind or also suffer from a second disability.

Mr. Loyden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration he is giving to enhancing the living standards of blind people.

Mr. Newton: In looking for further practical improvements towards our objective of a more coherent system of benefits for disabled people we think it generally more appropriate to concentrate on helping all disabled people with particular needs rather than to single out particular types of disability.

To help the development of policy in the longer term we have commissioned a comprehensive survey from the office of Population Censuses and Surveys to provide up-to-date information about disabled people, including those with sensory impairment, their circumstances and their needs. We have also carried out a series of fact finding visits into the level of services locally for visually handicapped people and the information collected is currently being analysed.

Solvent Abuse

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he has taken on matters within his responsibility and what further steps he proposes to curb glue sniffing and solvent abuse.

Mr. John Patten: My reply of 26 July at columns 770-71, to my hon. Friend, gave a progress report on action being taken by the Government to deal with the problem of solvent misuse in England and Wales. Since then the National Children's Bureau post referred to in the reply has been filled. We have also issued, through a circular to health and local authorities, guidance on the distribution of a Health Education Council leaflet giving advice to parents and professionals concerned with children misusing solvents.

The wide range of measures taken will continue to help parents and workers to co-operate more effectively to discourage solvent misuse through education and persuasion.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many (a) one-parent families, (b) pensioners and (c) unemployed received supplementary benefits in 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers in receipt of supplementary benefit at November-December each year were as follows:

Year	Pensioners	*One-Parent Families	(thousands) Unemployed
1979	1,723	306	566
1980	1,694	316	854
1981	1,738	369	1,318
1982	1,781	415	1,722
1983†	1,643	448	1,818

* Excludes a small number of single parents claiming for reasons other than being a single parent.
† Provisional.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people received supplementary benefit in 1966 and 1983, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: The number of claimants receiving supplementary benefit at December 1966 was 2·5 million, compared with 4·3 million (provisional) at December 1983.

Nursing Homes

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied that local authorities are able to exercise sufficient control over the establishment of private residential nursing homes; whether he considers that adequate regular inspections of such establishments are being carried out; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I would refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes) on 6 November, at column 47.

Burnley

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the staff levels at his Department's Burnley offices; how these compare with one year ago; and whether any changes are proposed.

Mr. Whitney: The complement of staff allocated to the Burnley office on 1 November 1983 was 196 and the actual staff in post at that date was 204. The complement on 1 November 1984 was 195 and the actual staff in post at that date was 205. The Burnley office has been authorised to recruit to a staffing level of 208 by 1 December 1984.

Hospital Treatment Statistics (Mid-Staffordshire)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will detail the number of (a) inpatient cases,

(b) day cases and (c) outpatient attendances, dealt with by each health district serving the present Mid-Staffordshire parliamentary constituency in each year since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: We do not gather information about health services provided to populations of parliamentary constituencies. My hon. Friend's constituency overlaps Mid-Staffordshire and South East Staffordshire health districts, and a significant proportion of the latter's population turns to North Birmingham health district for health services; the figures for these three health districts are given in the tables.

District Health Authority	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983
Inpatient discharges and deaths
Mid Staffordshire	16,784	17,691	18,404	19,398	21,521
South East Staffordshire	16,395	17,420	17,654	18,217	18,000

South East Staffordshire	2,916	3,062	3,230	3,376	3,481
North Birmingham	1,675	1,862	2,258	2,499	2,680

North Birmingham	161,679	165,711	161,571	160,484	157,872

Privatisation

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many authorities have so far complied with Government plans to privatise cleaning, catering and laundry services; and what savings have been made;

(2) if he will list the sanctions available to him against authorities which do not comply with Government policy regarding privatisation of services; whether he is satisfied that they are effective; and if he has any plans to seek further powers in this area.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We expect all health authorities to comply with our policy on competitive tendering for these services. Very worthwhile savings are being achieved whether the work remains in-house or goes to a private contractor. Thirty-four contracts already let to outside contractors will produce savings of over £6 million a year. Only a few health authorities are refusing at the moment to submit programmes for competitive tendering and efforts continue to point out to them that it is against the interests of their patients to fail to seek the savings and extra funds for patient care which tendering can produce. It is too soon to start talking about sanctions but we are satisfied that my right hon. Friend has sufficient powers should they be needed.

Severe Disablement Allowance

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what criteria he intends to use in order to determine whether an applicant for severe disablement allowance is 80 per cent. disabled.

Mr. Newton: The level of disablement will be assessed in accordance with criteria similar to those already used in the industrial injuries and war pensions schemes. The assessment will be made not only in relation to such conditions as are prescribed in regulations but also by comparison with a normal healthy person of the same age and sex.

Certain groups, including those registered blind or partially sighted and those receiving attendance allowance or mobility allowance, will automatically be accepted as at least 80 per cent. disabled without the need for further examination.

Patients (Money)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the amount of patients' money that has accumulated in each district health authority in respect of (a) mobility allowance for disabled patients and (b) other allowances for those of retirement age; and what is the number of patients in each category in respect of whom the money is held.

Mr. Newton: Information is collected centrally only on the total money that has accumulated in patients' balances in each district health authority. No breakdown is available centrally on the sources of the money or the number of patients.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the amount of patients' money that has accumulated centrally in respect of (a) mobility allowance for disabled patients and (b) other allowances for those of retirement age; and what is the number of patients in each of these categories in respect of whom the money is held.

Mr. Newton: No patients' money is accumulated centrally.

Heart Disease

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what additional funding has ben made available to the Health Education Council for the prevention of heart disease, following the publication of the Canterbury and COMA reports;

(2) what plans he has to make specific funding available to regional and district health authorities to develop strategies for the prevention of heart disease, following the publication of the Canterbury and COMA reports.

Mr. John Patten: A major programme aimed at attacking the problem of cardiovascula disease through concerted local action is being undertaken in Wales by the Health Education Council, which is directly funded by the Government. This is intended as a pilot for future programmes in the rest of the country. Regional health authorities have identified cardiovascular disease as a priority in their 10-year forward planning, and we expect to see them reflecting this in their allocations in future years.

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost to industry in the latest available year of forgone output due to premature mortality and sickness absence from work resulting from coronary heart disease,. ICD 410-414, in males and females in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not readily available. The cost to industry of premature mortality and sickness must rest on wide-ranging assumptions which cannot easily be validated. However, in England and Wales in 1982 there were about 26,100 deaths from coronary heart disease among men aged 25 to 64 and about 3,300 among women aged 25 to 59; sickness and invalidity benefit was paid in 1981-82 for about 23 million days for men and about 1 million days for women.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library the evidence considered by his advisory committee on gynaecological cytology about the trend in the incidence of cervical cancer in other countries.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Evidence is referred to in the report of the committee's working party on the age and frequency of screening, a copy of which is in the Library. The committee continues to evaluate similar evidence as and when it is published.

Skin Hospital, Manchester

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of inpatients and outpatients treated for skin diseases at the Skin hospital, Manchester, in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is as follows:

Manchester Skin hospital: patients treated (all conditions)

Year	Inpatient discharges and deaths	New outpatient attendances	Total outpatient attendances
1974	684	13,156	33,384
1975	596	12,150	33,730
1976	460	11,576	32,601
1977	601	11,543	32,182
1978	547	11,782	29,415
1979	579	12,269	31,324
1980	647	13,127	29,744
1981	638	12,987	31,994
1982	652	12,607	30,329
1983	725	14,518	36,219

Injectable Contraceptives

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department gives any guidance to health authorities about what information on possible side effects should be provided to those patients who are given injectable contraceptives.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Details of possible adverse effects of injectable contraceptives are set out in product data sheets supplied to all doctors. Depo-Provera is the only injectable preparation currently licensed for long-term use as a contraceptive. Before Depo-Provera is marketed for long-term use, the manufacturers will include in the product literature a reminder to doctors of the importance of patient counselling whenever the product is being considered for long-term use in contraception. They will also produce an information leaflet, to include information on possible side effects, which doctors will be asked to give to patients whenever they prescribe Depo-Provera for long-term use.

Doctors

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many general practitioners in (a) the Yorkshire regional health authority and (b) Leeds metropolitan district council area are over the age of 65 years on the latest available figures.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: At 1 October 1983 there were 102 unrestricted general medical practitioners aged 65 years or over practising in the Yorkshire region and 51 such doctors practising in the area of the Leeds city council.

NHS (Spectacles)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department's form G11/April 84 is correct in stating that someone cannot have private lenses fitted to National Health Service frames and that it is necessary to pay the full cost of new spectacles.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes, and that has been the position since the introduction of the NHS ophthalmic service.

Patients can obtain any lens through the NHS to meet their clinical needs and it has not therefore been considered necessary to permit the supply of private lenses under the NHS. Private lenses may be fitted to a NHS frame but the transaction would be a private one and the charge for the frame would be for agreement between the optician and the patient.

Kidney Patients

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if health authorities work to any guidelines in accepting or rejecting kidney patients for dialysis or transplant on the grounds of such social criteria as perceived employability, age or parental status.

Mr. John Patten: Whether or not to accept a patient for a particular form of treatment is entirely a matter for the doctor concerned in the light of whatever factors he considers relevant.

Pensioners (Telephone Charges)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will consider increasing benefit to cover the rental charges of telephones where they have been installed by social work departments on the basis of medical need to pensioners on supplementary pension.

Mr. Newton: We have no plans to do so. However, local authorities have powers to assist with telephone rental charges for elderly and disabled people where they are satisfied of the need for such help.

Drugs (GP Prescribing)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the overall quantity of drugs in general and benzodiazepines in particular, prescribed by general practitioners in the past 12 months; and how these figures compare with the previous 12 months.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 9 November 1984, c. 47]: The numbers of prescriptions dispensed by chemists and appliance contractors in England for all drugs, and those in the benzodiazepine group during the latest 12 months available and the previous months were as follows:

(Millions)

	All drugs	Benzodiazepines
October 1981—September 1982	307·9	24·4
October 1982—September 1983	314·6	23·9

Figures for benzodiazepines are based on a 1 in 200 sample of dispensed prescriptions.

Figures for all prescriptions are based on an actual count.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agriculture Council

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Agriculture Council meeting held in Brussels on 12 and 13 November.

Mr. Jopling: With my hon. Friend the Minister of State, I represented the United Kingdom at the Council of Agriculture Ministers in Brussels on 12/13 November.

The Council discussed a compromise proposal on the remaining issues in the new structures package. Since further information was needed on the financial provision for structural policy, it was not possible to reach conclusions and discussion will be resumed in December.

Commissioner Pisani reported to the Council on the serious problems in Ethiopia and North Africa generally and on the action already taken by the Community. He commended, in particular, the United Kingdom farmers' "give a tonne" campaign. I expressed our great concern over the current emergency and underlined the United Kingdom Government's support for Community action. The Council will be discussing food aid again on the basis of a paper which the Commission is preparing. I made it clear that the Community's policy on food aid is a matter for the Development Council to decide in the context of development policy generally.

There was a further lengthy discussion on wine, but no progress was possible towards the reform of this regime.

On the milk supplementary levy, I asked the Commissioner for an up-to-date report on the arrangements for implementation in all member states. I asked him also for an assurance that the Commission would take immediate steps if the arrangements for charging levy were not being properly applied in particular member states. In discussion, it was clear that the French Government were not ready to charge the levy this month. I was supported by some other member states in pointing to the unfairness to which this would give rise. With the support of seven member states, including the United Kingdom, the President asked the Commission to change the present rules so that the first collection of levy would relate to the period to the end of December. This was intended to allow all member states to proceed in parallel. The Commission will now be considering the outcome of the Council discussion. When the Commission's decision is known, I shall make a further announcement.

The French Minister drew attention to the problems facing French beef producers and asked for the Council's unanimous agreement to measures taken by the French Government. Along with a number of other Ministers, I made it clear that I was not prepared to approve the French action. The Commissioner said that the French measures did not appear to conform to the treaty and asked for more information on them.

On Dutch gas prices, the Commission confirmed that it had received the information from the Dutch Government and would be considering this issue next week. I emphasised the urgency, given that the winter heating season is upon us.

Finally, the Council discussed further a proposal designed to make a start in harmonising charging for meat inspection in the member states. This is the remaining item from the package of veterinary measures which was otherwise agreed at the June Council. The Council asked the Committee of Permanent Representatives to carry out further work in preparation for next month's Council. We emphasised the importance of early agreement on the harmonisation of inspection standards under the poultry-meat hygiene directive.

Dairy Quotas

72. Mr. Watson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the measures adopted to ensure that European Economic Community dairy quotas are not exceeded by other European Economic Community members.

Mr. Jopling: I have been most concerned that all member states should be implementing the milk supplementary levy according to the Community regulations. I again pressed the Agriculture Commissioner on this issue at the Council in Brussels on 12-13 November and I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave today to my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) on the outcome of that Council.

Land Settlement Association (Tenants)

Mr. Skeet asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the number of tenants of the Land Settlement Association at Chawston and Wyboston, Bedfordshire, who have now entered into contracts for the purchase of their holdings.

Mrs. Fenner: Three tenants on the former LSA estate at Chawston and Wyboston have exchanged contracts for or completed the purchase of their holdings. In addition, a further 44 tenants have agreed the terms of their purchases subject to contract.

Straw Burning

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what conclusions were drawn from the weekly monitoring by his Department of straw burning.

Mr. Jopling: Reports received from my Department's offices around the country have indicated that less straw has been burnt this year. More straw has been baled, in part perhaps because of the greater need for straw as feed following a dry growing season. There has been increased interest in incorporation of straw in the soil, at least among farmers on those soils which are more suited to incorporation.

Where straw has been burnt, the great majority of farmers have acted responsibly and made a real effort to comply with the requirements of the new model byelaws and with the National Farmers Union's revised code of practice. They have resulted in a considerable improvement in straw and stubble burning practices this year, and the number of incidents of bad burning has been much reduced. These reports have been borne out by the fire services, which report a reduction in the number of call-outs.

However, there is still room for improvement. I intend, through publicity, to maintain pressure on farmers to continue this improvement, in particular by burning only where there is no alternative and by paying more heed to advice on the weather conditions suitable for burning.

Slaughtermen

Mr. Hill asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether, in the current investigation by the Farm Animal Welfare Council into conditions of slaughtering of animals in abattoirs, any changes are being considered regarding the piece-rate system of payment for slaughtermen.

Mrs. Fenner: The Farm Animal Welfare Council reported to Agriculture Ministers on the welfare of red meat animals at the time of slaughter in June this year, and commented on the payment of slaughtermen on a piece-work basis. We are now considering the council's recommendations.

Mr. Hill asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what training is given to slaughtermen and what encouragement to act in a humane manner when dealing with animals for slaughter.

Mrs. Fenner: Training of slaughtermen is a matter for managements of slaughterhouses subject to any conditions laid down by local authorities in granting licences to slaughtermen. Recommendations by the Farm Animal Welfare Council regarding the training of slaughtermen are now under consideration by the Government.

Priorities Board

Mr. Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the names of the members now serving on the Priorities Board to advise him on future agricultural research; and whether he has so far received any advice from them.

Mrs. Fenner: The members of the Priorities Board for Research and Development in Agriculture and Food are as follows:

Mr. K. Durham, Chairman, Unilever plc (Chairman).
Professor R. L. Bell, Chief Scientific Adviser and Director General of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.
Mr. R. Halstead, CBE Chairman, Beecham Group plc.
Professor Sir Hans Kornberg, FRS Professor of Biochemistry in the University of Cambridge and Master of Christ's College.
Mr. J. S. Martin, CBE, Farmer, Cambridgeshire.
Mr. J. E. Moffitt, CBE, Farmer, Northumberland.
Dr. A. M. Raven, Scientific Adviser to the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland.
Sir Ralph Riley, FRS, Secretary and Deputy Chairman, Agricultural and Food Research Council.

The board's terms of reference are to advise the United Kingdom Agriculture Ministers and the chairman of the Agricultural and Food Research Council on priorities for research and development in agriculture and food and on the allocation of research and development Budgets.

We have not yet received advice from the board. It first met at the end of July and has been working on the methods which it will use to assess priorities between different sectors of research and development in agriculture and food. The substantial task of arriving at its first major set of recommendations on priorities and budget allocations will take several more months to complete and this work can be expected to occupy the Board's first year of office.

We expect to receive shortly the board's advice on matters relating to the future of the soil survey of England and Wales.

"Home Defence and the Farmer"

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will review his Department's pamphlet "Home Defence and the Farmer", originally published in 1958.

Mrs. Fenner: The pamphlet is already being reviewed with a view to publication of a revised version.

Nuclear War

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what part his Department is taking in the study of the scientific committee on problems of the environment in respect of the consequences for agriculture of nuclear war.

Mrs. Fenner: My Department is not taking part in this study.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the scientists who have expressed reservations to him about the conclusions of the Washington conference on the long-term consequences of nuclear war.

Mrs. Fenner: Many scientists have expressed reservations about the conclusions of this conference but none has done so to me personally.

Cereal Stores (Intervention)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the location of intervention cereal stores in the United Kingdom giving the tonnage of each category of cereal in each store for the most recent date possible.

Mr. Jopling: On 27 October, the latest date for which information is available, the location of cereals intervention stores and the quantities of cereal by category which they contained were the following:

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 15 November 1984

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The Second Church Estates Commissioner

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, for what responsibilities he answers questions.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The Second Church Estates Commissioner answers parliamentary questions upon all functions of the Church Commissioners. The Commissioners are required to direct the income from the assets entrusted to them primarily towards the support of the pay, pensions and housing of the stipendiary ministry of the Church of England. They have also other statutory responsibilities, notably in the sphere of pastoral reorganisation.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Drug Offences (Arrests)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of stops under section 23(2) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 and the resultant arrests for drug offences in the Metropolitan police district of those aged (a) 16 years and under, (b) 17 to 18 years and (c) 19 to 21 years for the most recent year for which statistics are available.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the readily available information may be subject to some error as it is compiled from information recorded in station registers for operational purposes which is unsuitable for the preparation of statistical summaries. It shows 16,576 stops under section 23(2) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 in the Metropolitan police district in 1983. Information on arrests resulting from these stops does not separately identify arrests for drug offences, nor are there any centrally collected statistics by age of person stopped.

Remand System

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures the Government planned to introduce concerning the number of people remanded in custody each year; and if he will consider the introduction of a pre-trial agency to increase the amount and quality of information available to courts making bail decisions.

Mr. Mellor: The decision whether a person charged with an offence should be remanded in custody or on bail is one for the court to take in the exercise of its judical discretion, subject to the requirements of the Bail Act 1976, which creates a presumption in favour of the grant of bail. We have no present plans for changes in that Act or for the establishment of an agency such as my hon. Friend suggests.

BBC (Licence Fee)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he next plans to meet the chairman of the British Broadcasting Corporation to discuss the level of the licence fee.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No such meeting is planned at present.

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what has been (a) the shortest and (b) the longest time in dealing with an individual charged with an offence in connection with the mining dispute;

(2) what is the average length of time in bringing to court people charged with offences arising in connection with the mining dispute.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not available centrally and could not be collected without disproportionate cost.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons involved in the mining dispute have been sentenced to imprisonment; and what has been the average term of imprisonment.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Between 13 March and 6 November inclusive, the latest period for which information is available centrally, 46 of those convicted of offences in connection with the miners' strike received sentences of imprisonment. The longest term of imprisonment imposed was nine months, but it is not possible from the information available centrally to calculate the average term of imprisonment.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people involved in the mining dispute have (a) been charged and (b) been dealt with by the courts since the mining dispute began.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Between 13 March and 6 November inclusive, the latest period for which information is available centrally, 6,294 people were charged with offences in connection with the miners' dispute. During the same period 2,731 cases arising from the dispute were dealt with by the courts.

Dr. Alan Clift

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the reports of the forensic experts, invited by Dr. Clift to comment on the Home Office conclusions of his work, were submitted to the retirement board.

Mr. Brittan: Yes.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence was given by Dr. Curry, the previous controller of the forensic science service, to the departmental retirement board considering the early retirement of Dr. Clift about Dr. Clift's report on the Preece case.

Mr. Brittan: As I explained in my reply to the right hon. Member's question on 14 November, at column 260, the proceedings of a departmental retirement board are held in private and it would not be appropriate to publish or indicate details of its proceedings.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Appeal Court cases which followed the investigation of Dr. Clift's work, giving the outcome and indicating the cases in which (a) the court evidence was reassessed by an independent expert, (b) the forensic material was available and re-examined by an independent witness, (c) the material was not available and (d) the sentences were stated by the court to be quashed solely because Dr. Clift had handled the material.

Mr. Brittan: I referred 11 cases to the Court of Appeal. In three of them the appellant subsequently abandoned his appeal. Of the other eight, the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeals in five cases, and quashed the convictions in three. In each of the referred cases Dr. Clift's contribution was assessed by a member of the Home Office forensic science service. In two cases, in each of which the appeal was dismissed, he was able to re-examine some of the original samples prior to the hearing; the defence arranged for these samples to be separately re-examined on its behalf. From the information available to me I understand that in no case did the court state that it had quashed the conviction solely on the ground that Dr. Clift had handled the material.

Clothing (Seizure)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidance to magistrates advising them that, where clothing is seized by the police and is found to bear counterfeit brand names, it should not be destroyed but made available for charitable purposes.

Mr. Mellor: No. Where an application is made to a magistrates' court under the Police (Property) Act 1897 regarding property whose owner cannot be ascertained it is within the court's discretion, taking account of all the circumstances, to determine what is to be done with it. It would not be appropriate for my right hon. and learned Friend to seek to influence magistrates in their exercise of that discretion.

Breath Tests

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in the light of the recent High Court decision, he has any plans to introduce legislation to amend the Transport Act 1981 in respect of convictions for refusing breath tests.

Mrs. Chalker: I have been asked to reply.

I shall be studying the details of the case referred to by my hon. Friend. All I would say at this stage is that failure without reasonable cause to provide a specimen of breath for a breath test has been an offence since the implementation of the Road Safety Act 1967. An offence of this nature is clearly essential for the effective operation of the law in respect of drinking and driving.

Nursing Homes (Prosecutions)

Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been brought against private residential nursing homes in the past 12 months by public, professional or governmental bodies; and how this compares with the previous 12 months.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 9 November 1984, c. 22]: The information readily available to me, which may be incomplete, relates to all prosecutions under the Nursing Homes Act 1975 and regulations thereunder and under the Public Health (Drainage of Trade Premises) Act 1937; it shows 378 such proceedings in 1982 and 286 in 1983.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the United Kingdom share, expressed in percentages, of trade in manufactured goods since 1954.

Mr. Fletcher: Data for 1954 are not readily available. The information for 1955 to 1983 is as follows:

Cereal Exports

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will state the total amount of cereals exported to (a) the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and (b) China in 1960, 1970, 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983 from the European Economic Community; and whether he has any information as to the percentage this represents of their total imports.

Mr. Fletcher: The available information is as follows:

Licensed Premises (Weights and Measures)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations or evidence he has received about the practice of selling beer and cider in short measures in licensed premises; and whether he will seek to strengthen the law to prevent this practice.

Mr. Fletcher: Local authorities regularly review the situation and periodically make known the results of their surveys. Although problems of enforcement do exist we are not yet convinced that strengthening the law is the most appropriate solution.

Liquidations (South Tyneside)

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many companies in south Tyneside went into liquidation between 1974 to 1979 and 1979 to the latest available date.

Mr. Fletcher: I regret that figures of company liquidations are not available by area.

Banana Licensing

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the results of the review of the banana licensing arrangements, with particular reference to the effects of any changes on the banana industry in the Windward Islands.

Mr. Fletcher: Following consultations with a wide range of interested parties, revised import licensing arrangements for bananas were adopted from 1 October. More competition has been introduced by making the quota for bananas from restricted sources (the so-called dollar area) available to a larger number of traders than hitherto. A significant share, however, continues to be allocated to importers of bananas from Jamaica and the Windward Islands, who give effect to the Government's long-standing obligations to those countries to maintain their preferential position on the banana market in the United Kingdom. The changes to the licensing arrangements for dollar area bananas do not undermine this preferential position.

Information Technology

Dr. Bray asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much of his departmental expenditure on information technology research and development projects was applied for, approved, and spent, respectively, in 1983-84, and so far in 1984-85; and what effect he expects the moratorium on new applications announced on 12 November 1984 to have on expenditure in the rest of 1984-85, and in 1985-86.

Mr. Pattie: Department of Trade and Industry expenditure on projects in those areas directly concerned with information technology research and development (including computing, telecommunications, consumer electronics, cable systems, capital electronics, office systems, microelectronics, fibre optics, the Alvey programme, and the use of IT in manufacturing) is as follows:

	1983-84	1984-85 (to date)
	£ million	£ million
Applied for	449·930	101·359
Approved	214·342	149·622
Spent	100·735	57·273

NB. these figures are subject to time lags between application, approval and expenditure. They exclude space R&D and such IT initiatives as micros in schools, ITECs.

The moratorium on new applications announced on 12 November will have no effect on expenditure in the rest of 1984-85, which is already fully committed to approved projects. As announced earlier, most of the 1985-86 allocation has already been committed. The extent to which there will be further expenditure in 1985-86 on applications received after the moratorium ends will depend on the outcome of the review now being undertaken.

Coal Imports

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list by volume, the coal imports to the United Kingdom for each month since January 1984 from Poland, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, West Germany, France, Belgium, Australia and South Africa.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to the reply, 13 November 1984, c. 179]: Information about the volumes of coal which have been imported into the United Kingdom is provided in Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom, which is available in the Library.

Johnson Group Cleaners (Merseyside)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received concerning the proposed takeover bid by Nottingham Manufacturing Company for Johnson Group Cleaners (Merseyside); and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher [pursuant to his reply, 14 November 1984, c. 243]: Representations made to the Secretary of State regarding proposed mergers are confidential.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will refer the takeover bid by Nottingham Manufacturing Co. from Johnson Group Cleaners (Merseyside) to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission;

(2) if he will refer to the Office of Fair Trading the takeover bid for the Johnson Group Cleaners (Merseyside) by the Nottingham Manufacturing Company.

Mr. Fletcher [pursuant to his reply, 14 November 1984, c. 243]: My right hon. Friend announced today that he had decided, in accordance with the advice of the Director-General of Fair Trading, not to refer this proposed merger to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Multicultural Education

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the reservation on the Council of Europe recommendation on training of teachers for a multicultural society put forward by the United Kingdom Government at the 46th session of the Council represents a change in his Department's policy on multicutural education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: No. The Government's reservation on the Council of Europe recommendation on "The training of teachers in education for intercultural understanding, notably in a context of migration" was consistent with existing Government policy. My right hon. Friend is looking to the committee of inquiry into the education of children from ethnic minority groups, chaired by Lord Swann, for further advice on this area of policy. The committee's report is expected shortly.

Teacher Training

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether it is his Department's policy that the initial and in-service training of teachers should include an awareness of the economic, social, political and historical causes and effects of migration.

Mr. Dunn: Teachers and intending teachers should have an understanding of the nature of British society and are therefore likely to need an appreciation of the impact on it of migration. The time available within initial teacher training courses is however limited and may not allow for detailed consideration of a complex question. It is for local education authorities to consider the priority which should be attached to in-service provision in this area, in the light of the overall training needs of their teachers.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether it is his Department's policy that the multicultural dimension should be an integral feature of teacher training.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales have issued criteria for the approval of initial teacher training course which require that intending teachers should be prepared to teach the full range of pupils whom they are likely to encounter in an ordinary school, to respond flexibly to their diversity of ability, behaviour, social background and ethnic and cultural origins, and to guard against preconceptions based on the race or sex of pupils. Intending teachers will also need to have a basic understanding of the ethnic diversity of the society in which their pupils are growing up.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science why the Government put forward a reservation to the Council of Euorpe recommendation on training teachers for a multicore society at the 46th session of the Council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The Government put down a reservation on the Council of Europe's recommendation on "The training of teachers in education for intercultural understanding, notably in a context of migration" because, for the reasons stated in the reservation, experience of responding to ethnic diversity in the United Kingdom led them to believe that the full recommendaion was not directly applicable in this country. I am sending the hon. Member the full text of the United Kingdom reservation.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether it is his Department's policy that teacher training preparation should include preparation for teaching host languages more effectively, and give student teachers the opportunity of learning the basis of one or more minority language.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales have issued criteria for the approval of initial teacher training courses which require that intending teachers should appreciate the importance for the learning process of the exchange of language between teacher and pupil, and that initial training courses for primary teachers should devote a substantial amount of time to the study of teaching language. Whilst teachers need also to be able to respond to the ethnic and cultural diversity of their pupils, there may not be time available in training courses to provide instruction in a minority language.

Libyan Students

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many Libyan students are enrolled in British universities and polytechnics at the present time; and who sponsors them.

Mr. Brooke: In 1983-84, the latest year for which information is available, 402 students domiciled in Libya attended full-time and sandwich courses in universities in Great Britain. The comparable figure for polytechnics was 75.

I understand that no Libyan students have, in recent years, benefited from any of the various scholarship and award schemes by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Overseas Development Administration or the British Council. One Libyan student holds an award under the overseas research student awards scheme.

Scottish Universities

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish figures for the academic years 1982-83 and 1983-84 to show (a) the total number of full-time students at each Scottish university and (b) the number of full-time staff at each university, giving the student-staff ratio in each case.

Mr. Brooke: The available information is as follows:

Commonwealth Education Ministers (Conference Report)

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action is being taken by Her Majesty's Government in response to the report of the Commonwealth Education Ministers conference in Nicosia.

Mr. Brooke: The conference allowed for a valuable exchange of views on the three themes discussed, and in particular on that of student mobility within the Commonwealth, over which some differences of approach and practice emerged. The Government are considering the views expressed at the conference and note that there is to be a brief meeting of Commonwealth Education Ministers late next year either immediately before or after the UNESCO general conference, at which discussion can be taken further.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Mr. Ashley asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what advice was given by the Scottish Crown lawyers to Dr. Clift in the appeal in the case of John Preece about the style of the forensic report for the Scottish court and, in particular, about reference to the blood group of the murdered woman.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Dr. Clift was given a report prepared in connection with another case to use as a style. No advice was given to him as to how he should deal in his report with the blood group of the murdered woman.

PRIME MINISTER

Wrexham

Q14. Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister if she has any further plans to visit Wrexham.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

National Audit Office

Q18. Mr. Michael Morris asked the Prime Minister if she will introduce legislation to allow the National Audit Office access to the affairs and accounts of the nationalised industries.

The Prime Minister: I believe it is more appropriate for nationalised industries to be audited by commercial auditors.

Reddish

Q19. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Prime Minister if she will visit Reddish.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

UNESCO

Q36. Mr. Jessel asked the Prime Minister what is the cost of British membership of UNESCO.

The Prime Minister: The normal cost of membership of UNESCO is about £5 million per annum. The cost will be reduced in 1984 by refunds from previous years amounting to about £4·5 million, due to currency fluctuation.

Liverpool

Q110. Mr. Heffer asked the Prime Minister when she next intends to discuss with Liverpool city council the problems of the area; and what steps she is taking to bring down unemployment in the area.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to hold discussions with the city council. The Government are, of course, concerned about the level of unemployment in Liverpool. No other area in Great Britain receives such high levels of Government assistance. The creation of the Merseyside task force, the Merseyside development corporation, and more recently Britain's first international garden festival and its largest freeport testify to the Government's commitment to the area. But ultimately it is a healthy economy and competitive industry which will provide the new jobs we all want to see. Our policies are directed to this end and we continue to look for ways of building on what has been achieved so far. In the meantime a substantial number of people in the area are benefiting from our special employment and training measures.

Human Rights

Mr. Terlezki asked the Prime Minister if she will call on the Soviet Union to set up a conference which would deal exclusively with human rights, under the terms set out in the Helsinki agreement.

The Prime Minister: Arrangements are already in hand for a meeting, within the Helsinki framework, to discuss human rights and fundamental freedoms. This will take place in Ottawa in May 1985 and will be attended by representatives of the 35 participating states of the conference on security and co-operation in Europe, including the Soviet Union. The mandate for the meeting is laid down in the concluding document of the Madrid review meeting (Cmnd. 9066). The United Kingdom intends to play its full part in the Ottawa discussions.

Engagements

Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 15 November.

Mr. Gould asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 November.

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister what are her official engagements for 15 November.

Mr. Shersby asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 November.

Mr. Brinton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 November.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 November.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 November.

Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 November.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for 15 November.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 November.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided over a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Commonwealth Heads of Government Conference

Mr. Key asked the Prime Minister what progress has been made in following up the intentions expressed in the communiqué issued at the end of the Commonwealth Heads of Government conference in New Delhi in 1983.

The Prime Minister: The Commonwealth Secretary-General has made good progress in following up the tasks entrusted to him by the Commonwealth Heads of Government at their conference in New Delhi in 1983. Among the specific decisions of that conference, the study which Commonwealth Heads of Government asked the Commonwealth Secretary-General to undertake into the special needs of small states is now in progress. A study group under the chairmanship of the Chief Justice of the Bahamas has been appointed and is expected to report its conclusions to the next Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting. We have contributed ourselves to the study and will continue to give what support we can to its deliberations.

The Commonwealth consultative group on economic questions, appointed in accordance with the New Delhi statement on economic action, has already reported to Commonwealth Finance Ministers when they met in Toronto in September. The Commonwealth action group on Cyprus was convened, and lent its support to the initiatives now being taken by the United Nations Secretary-General.

We have given our support to the various conclusions reached in New Delhi on functional co-operation in the Commonwealth.

Progress in all these fields will be reviewed by the meeting of Commonwealth senior officials in Barbados in December 1984.

Commonwealth (Government Policy)

Mr. Key asked the Prime Minister how she ensures the co-ordination of Government policies towards the Commonwealth.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs is responsibile for ensuring the co-ordination of Government policies towards the Commonwealth.

Within the Foreign and Commonwealth Office one department has the specific task of ensuring that Commonwealth aspects are fully taken into account in the formulation of our overseas policies.

Cabinet Office Efficiency Unit

Mr. Onslow asked the Prime Minister what are the current terms of reference of the Cabinet Office efficiency unit.

The Prime Minister: Under the direction of Sir Robin Ibbs the efficiency unit advises me on the strategy for improving the efficiency and effectiveness of Government services. I have particularly asked it to help Ministers set targets for improvements in value for money and to help them conduct efficiency scrutinies and other work to bring these improvements about. The unit works closely with the Cabinet Office and Her Majesty's Treasury.

USA (President)

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to meet the President of the United States; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have congratulated President Reagan on his magnificent election victory. I hope to have an early opportunity to meet him again.

Public Limited Companies

Mr. Yeo asked the Prime Minister (1) if she will list the public limited companies in which Government shareholdings of 5 per cent. or more are held;

(2) what is the market value, where available, at the latest practicable date, of the Government shareholding in those public limited companies in which the Government hold an equity interest of more than 5 per cent.

The Prime Minister: Details of shares and other securities held as assets of the Consolidated Fund and National Loans Funds Accounts (1982-83 HC 158). Public limited companies in which the Government held a shareholding of 5 per cent. or more at 31 March 1984 are listed, together with a market valuation of the shareholding where this is appropriate using share prices at close of dealing on Monday 12 Novemeber.

Overseas Development Association

Mr. Thurnham asked the Prime Minister what representations she has received about providing funds to the Overseas Development Administration by way of a temporary 1 per cent. levy on food sales in the United Kingdom for the remainder of the financial year 1984-85; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have received one such representation. Within the allocation for the aid programme, the Government are well able to respond swiftly and generously to the emergency situation in Ethiopia and other African countries.

Data Protection

Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister (1) whether the code of practice, Cmnd. 9270, relating to data collected for statistical purposes, allows for any raw personal data collected for statistical survey to be passed to the police;

(2) whether the code of practice, Cmnd. 9270, relating to data collected for statistical purposes, allows for the data in statistical form to be passed to the police.

The Prime Minister: The conditions governing the transfer of statistical information to the police are the same as those for any organisation of bona fide researchers outside Government Departments. The code of practice provides for data about individuals to be transferred for statistical purposes where it has been safeguarded by being made anonymous. Information about identifiable individuals is not transferred except in very limited circumstances, which are clearly defined in the code.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Reform

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is able to make a statement about housing outside London for retired council tenants from the capital after the abolition of the Greater London council.

Sir George Young: We have already announced our intention that, if Parliament agrees to our proposals for the abolition of the Greater London council, the ownership of that council's seaside and country homes should pass to the district councils in whose areas they lie. We have also announced that there should be statutory arrangements to ensure that the great majority of the lettings remain available to London's elderly. Certain nomination rights to the transferred dwellings will therefore be formally vested under the abolition legislation in my right hon. Friend and there will be full consultation with the local authority associations concerned about the detailed arrangements to be adopted.

The financial basis of transfer will fairly reflect the benefits to be gained both by the councils in London and by the district councils. We intend that they should enable the district councils broadly to maintain on abolition the existing levels of rent and management and maintenance expenditure, although we do not guarantee to take on board any changes the GLC makes between now and 1986.

Further provision of homes for retired people will be a matter for the councils of the London boroughs, as the local housing authorities for the capital. The Government do, however, attach high priority to concentrating resources within the housing programme on capital provision for those in greatest housing need, including the elderly and the disabled. While boroughs may normally wish to build new homes for these groups within their own areas, we recognise that some may wish to exercise their powers to develop outside London, subject to my right hon. Friend's consent under section 21(3) of the London Government Act 1963.

My right hon. Friend has now decided that he will look sympathetically on applications by boroughs for such consent where they intend to provide dwellings exclusively for the use of the elderly or the disabled and where the prospective host authorities are content with the proposals. Once consent has been granted, my right hon. Friend would not expect subsequently to transfer to the district council ownership of whatever properties were developed within its terms, unless requested to do so under section 23 of the Act by the councils of both the district and the London borough concerned.

This announcement demonstrates our concern that the interests of the elderly and the disabled should not be affected by the abolition of the GLC. It confirms the priority we attach in housing programmes to provision for special needs groups, and our intention that the London boroughs should be able to continue the development of homes outside London for the retired and the disabled if they so wish. Some of the GLC's tenants have I know been worried that abolition would cause changes in their rents or the management expenditure on their estates. This statement shows that the terms of transfer will be designed so that rents and maintenance spending need not be affected on abolition, and will provide reassurance to those tenants who have expressed concern.

Urban Programme

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a detailed breakdown of the total urban programme for the financial years 1978-79 to 1984-85 (estimated); and if he will list the outturn urban programme grants paid to each partnership, programme and designated authority and the estimated figure for 1984-85, comparing for each authority the level of funding in each year with (a) housing subsidy received and (b) rate support grant before and after holdback.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: I have placed a copy of this information in the Library.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the reduction in real terms in the urban programme following the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The provision for the urban programme in England in 1985-86 will be £338 million. That is a cash reduction of £28 million below the planning figure set out in "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1984-85 to 1986-87" (Cmnd. 9143), but that means that in 1985-86 the urban programme will be maintained at the same level in cash as the likely outturn for 1984-85. Adjusted by the GDP deflator this implies a cost reduction of some 4 per cent. but the effect on programme activity will depend on actual cost changes in the relevant areas.

Local Authorities (Spending Targets)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek powers to give local councils a single spending target.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Rateable Properties (Revaluation)

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for a general revaluation by the Inland Revenue of rateable properties.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) on 22 October, at column 491.

Local Government Financing

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many external inquiries and internal inquiries have been undertaken into local govenment financing since 1954.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The only external inquiry into local government finance since 1954 was conducted by the Layfield committee, which reported in 1976. Within the Department internal inquiries into specific aspects of local government finance form a normal part of the process of policy appraisal and formulation.

Pollution (West Yorkshire)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements he proposes for the completion of plans required under section 2 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 in west Yorkshire in the event that the county council is abolished and responsibility for waste disposal matters is transferred to the district councils.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin: The Government intend that all aspects of waste regulation and disposal, including the completion of plans required under section 2 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, should become the responsibility of the district councils in the event of the abolition of West Yorkshire county council.

The need for long-term planning of waste disposal over a sufficiently wide area was, however, one of the key criteria in the consultation document "Streamlining the Cities: Waste Disposal"—10 November 1983—and it is expected that the plans produced will reflect this.

Conservation Areas (Planning Associations)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to assist conservation areas where there is overwhelming opposition to further development and where the local authority cannot afford to pay compensation on refusal of planning permission.

Mr. Macfarlane: I refer to the answer given to my hon. Friend on 31 October.

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any evidence that conservation areas are better protected than other areas when local authorities consider planning applications under the 10 per cent. rule.

Mr. Macfarlane: I have no reason to believe that local planning authorities fail to take material considerations into account when dealing with planning applications affecting conservation areas, whether there is a liability to pay compensation following refusal or not.

Town and Country Planning Act 1971

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how long reform of section 169 and schedule 8 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 have been under active consideration; and what difficulties lie in the way of a conclusion.

Mr. Macfarlane: The matter has been under consideration since the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Camden London Borough v. Peaktop Properties (Hampstead) Ltd. in May 1983. It has been necessary to consider carefully whether an amendment of the compensation provisions would amount to an unacceptable curtailment of rights of property.

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many of his officials are engaged full time in consideration of proposals to reform section 169 and schedule 8 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971.

Mr. Macfarlane: None full time. Consideration of proposals of the kind mentioned is part of the normal work of the Department.

Planning Applications (Compensation)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he knows of any instances in which a decision to refuse planning permission and uphold an appeal to his Department has subsequently been abandoned because of compensation liability under the 10 per cent. rule.

Mr. Macfarlane: I cannot answer for decisions of this kind taken by local planning authorities.

General Development Order

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in the light of his Department's paper on the general development order, he will make a statement on the requirement to obtain planning permission for any structure required for the keeping of horses and other animals on land of less than five acres.

Mr. Macfarlane: The proposal canvassed in my Department's consultation paper, issued in January, to which my hon. Friend refers, involved a suggestion that "permitted development" rights be introduced into the Town and Country Planning General Development Order for the use of up to two hectares of land for keeping horses for recreational purposes, but not for the erection of buildings. As at present, the erection of buildings specifically for this purpose would normally require planning permission. There has been a wide variety of responses to this and other proposals in the consultation paper, and my right hon. Friend will be glad to consider any comments on this proposal which my hon. Friend may wish to make.

District Councils (Expenditure)

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he intends taking to enable district councils to spend a higher proportion of their capital receipts on capital projects of their own choice.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has announced his intention of discussing with the local authority associations ways in which the control of local authority capital expenditure can be improved. Any representations which the associations may wish to make in the course of those discussions about the use of capital receipts will be carefully considered.

Tyne and Wear County Council

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he proposes to take in the event of the abolition of Tyne and Wear county council to provide financial assistance to the industry and employment programme of the metropolitan boroughs in the Tyne and Wear area.

Mr. Waldegrave: Metropolitan district councils taking over services currently the responsibility of the Tyne and Wear metropolitan county council will have allocated to them grant related expenditure appropriate to the needs to be met by those services. It will be for the districts to decide on any arrangements for continuing support for the council county industry and employment programme.

Cambridge Science Park

Mr. Rhodes James asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to announce his decision on the planning application now before him for the proposed new Cambridge science park submitted by St. John's college, Cambridge.

Mr. Macfarlane: The case raises some complex and difficult issues, but it will be dealt with as quickly as possible.

South Bank

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what approaches have been made to the Greater London council regarding ownership of the South Bank.

Mr. Waldegrave: A request for such information was made to the Greater London council in a letter dated 21 August sent by the Treasury Solicitor's Department acting on behalf of the Office of Arts and Libraries. The request was acknowledged, but the information requested has not so far been supplied.

Planning Inquiries (Guidance)

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance is given to inspectors hearing public inquiries about matters involving public access to land about the extent to which the inquiry should consider or hear evidence about claims to the ownership of the land in question.

Mr. Macfarlane: I understand that this question relates to the public inquiry held in 1982 concerning Maltby common. Prior to the inquiry the inspector was advised that the Secretary of State had satisfied himself on the ownership question and that the terms of reference did not extend to this issue. However, at the opening of the inquiry, this ruling was challenged by some of the objectors who argued that the ownership issue be investigated fully at the inquiry. The inspector responded that the inquiry could not be a forum for a detailed investigation of title to the land, but that in all the circumstances he was prepared to hear legal submissions as to whether the Secretry of State had jurisdiction to make the order, which was the subject of the inquiry. The inspector's decision was accepted by all the parties, and submissions by the parties on the ownership issue were made at the inquiry.

Yorkshire Water Authority (Disconnections)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many domestic customers in Leeds metropolitan district council have had their water supply cut off by the Yorkshire water authority since January 1984.

Mr. Macfarlane: In the period 1 January 1984 to 14 November 1984 the Yorkshire water authority cut off the water supply to four domestic consumers for non-payment of bills. In the same period two of these consumers were subsequently reconnected.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Food Labelling

Mr. Coombs asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will list those organisations and individuals involved in all formal or informal discussions on improved food labelling which he is conducting at present and has conducted in the last 12 months;

(2) if he is holding any informal discussions with representatives of the food industry about improved labelling on the nutritional value of food; and whether there is any medical or consumer input to these discussions;

(3) which consumer organisations he has asked to conduct research into aspects of food labelling; and when he expects the results of this research to be available;

(4) when he intends to announce his proposals for the labelling of foods with information on their nutritional value, in line with the recommendations of the COMA report;

(5) with which consumer organisations he is holding discussions on food labelling, following the publication of the COMA report.

Mrs. Fenner: Over the last 12 months my Department has had many contacts and discussions on improved food labelling. These have been with representatives of trade associations, consumer interests, enforcement authorities, commercial companies or private individuals, and cover both formal meetings, ad hoc contacts and exchanges of correspondence. Currently my Department and the Department of Health and Social Security are holding informal discussions with representatives of the food industry about the practicalities of fat content labelling of food. These discussions are covering the fat content labelling recommendations of the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy panel report on diet and cardiovascular disease, and also, at the request of industry, nutrition labelling. A medical adviser from the Department of Health and Social Security attends the meetings. My officials are also maintaining contact with consumer interests on developments arising from the COMA panel report, and their views are taken into account in discussions with industry. In collaboration with the Consumers Association and the National Consumer Council my Department has initiated a study on consumer attitudes to and understanding of fat content and nutrition labelling, with the results expected in spring 1985.

We are still considering the Government's response to the COMA panel report's recommendations on food labelling. These recommendations are far-reaching in their effects but I hope to be able to make an announcement within the next three months.

National Soil Survey

Mr. Beith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether it is his intention to continue financing the work necessary to enable the national soil survey on the 1 to 50,000 scale to be completed.

Mrs. Fenner: We are considering our funding of the work of the soil survey of England and Wales—£1·9 million in 1983-84—following my Ministry's recent review of commissioned research and development in soil science.

The Survey is a part of the Agriculture and Food Research Council organisation. We shall be considering the views of the Council and also consulting the new Priorities Board for Research and Development in Agriculture and Food about the future of the Survey. Until we have considered these views I am unable to comment on the future financing of the national survey on the 1 to 50,000 scale.

EC Wine Production

Mr. Deakins asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what limits exist on European Economic Community wine production; and what changes are anticipated to prepare the wine market for the admission of Spain and Portugal.

Mrs. Fenner: Since 1980 there has been a Community ban on new planting of vineyards producing non-quality wine. In addition, provision exists for the compulsory disillation of surplus wine.

These arrangements have failed to balance supply and demand and the Commission has recently proposed further measures, which are still under discussion, both to reduce substantially the area under vines and to deter over-production. If adopted they would apply to Spain and Portugal after accession but the Commission has also proposed specific programmes to reduce the area under vines in those countries.

Butter

Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much butter which would otherwise have been sold under normal market conditions he anticipates will go into intervention, having been displaced from the market by the special European Community scheme for cheaper butter at Christmas; and what will be the cost to the United Kingdom taxpayers of this substitution.

Mr. Jopling: Butter sold under the EEC special sale scheme will tend to displace fresh butter which would otherwise have been sold on the market. This is one of the reasons why we opposed this scheme. However, the displacement of normal sales will not necessarily be fully reflected in sales into intervention in the United Kingdom. This is partly because sales of imported butter may well decline and imports be reduced and partly because lower prices for butter may encourage consumption of butter at the expense of alternative fats. It is not possible to provide estimates of the consequences of these effects which will depend on the reactions of consumers to the availability of the special sale butter and of traders and others involved in the production and marketing of butter.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Black Economy

4. Mr. Shersby asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has for collecting the revenue that is lost to the Exchequer as a result of the growth of the black economy.

Mr. Peter Rees: By the end of this tax year we will have increased the number of Inland Revenue staff on investigation work by almost 700 since we came to power in 1979. We plan to deploy a further 1,000 by April 1988.

Value Added Tax

18. Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he intends to extend value added tax to any items currently zero rated during the current parliamentary Session; and if he will make a statement.

28. Mr. Baldry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement as to the Government's intention with regard to any extension of value added tax to cover commercial construction contracts, animal feeding stuffs, newspaper advertisements, children's shoes and generally.

34. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has plans to put value added tax on children's shoes.

26. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he plans to extend value added tax to the supply of newspaper and educational materials, including books, and books generally.

Mr. Hayhoe: Although the Government are committed to a shift in the burden of taxation from taxes on earnings to taxes on spending, we have no set views at present on how this might best be done.

Inflation

19. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of inflation.

Mr. Peter Rees: Over the 12 months to September 1984, the retail prices index increased by 4·7 per cent. As my right hon. Friend said in his autumn statement this week, the rate of increase in retail prices should be around 4¾ per cent. in the last quarter of this year, and is expected to fall to around 4½ per cent. by the end of next year.

Job Creation

20. Mr. Knox asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what new fiscal and monetary measures he plans to achieve a higher level of employment.

Mr. Peter Rees: Employment is already rising, but, as I have made clear before, more substantial progress depends less on action by Government than on a wider acceptance of more realistic attitudes to pay.

Average Wage

21. Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average wage at the latest available date; how this compares in real terms with that of 1975 and 1978; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Rees: According to the Department of Employment's "New Earnings Survey," average gross weekly earnings were £159·3 in April 1984. This figure is for full-time employees on adult rates whose pay was not affected by absence. In real terms, this is an increase of 9 per cent. since April 1975, and of 12½ per cent. since April 1978.

Pound Coin

22. Mr. Janner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will redesign the pound coin.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Policy on the £1 coin was announced in the autumn statement earlier this week.

Taxes Act

23. Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to seek to introduce into the Taxes Acts a statutory definition of employment.

Mr. Moore: We have no plans to introduce a special definition for tax purposes. Employment status is a matter of general law with wide implications beyond tax extending, for example, to national insurance contributions and benefits, employment protection and health and safety at work. The existing criteria laid down by the courts seek essentially to answer the question: is the individual in business on his own account? We believe that this is the right approach. To introduce a special definition for tax in place of existing law would only complicate matters and introduce fresh doubts. Where uncertainty now exists, inspectors of taxes are always willing to advise. The Inland Revenue will also shortly be publishing a leaflet explaining the detailed criteria adopted by the courts to help taxpayers understand the issues involved.

Company Profitability

24. Mr. Tracey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the trend of company profitability.

Mr. Peter Rees: The real rate of return for all non-North sea industrial and commercial companies increased from 3·4 per cent. in 1981 to 5·8 per cent. in 1983. Profits have continued to increase in 1984, suggesting that the upward trend is continuing.

Children's Shoes (VAT)

25. Mr. Michael Morris asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has had asserting the importance of children's shoes being zero-rated for value added tax.

Mr. Moore: Treasury Ministers have received some 160 letters.

27. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated yield from an extension of value added tax at current rates to children's shoes.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave today to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood).

World Debt

29. Mr. Skinner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent discussion he has had with other Finance Ministers regarding the world debt crisis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Rees: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer discussed international debt at the recent annual meetings of Commonwealth Finance Ministers, the IMF and the IBRD.

Taxation

30. Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he proposes to take to reduce the taxation burden on those on average earnings or less.

Mr. Moore: We hope to be able to make further increases in the real value of personal allowances—which concentrates relief on those at average earnings or less—as and when economic circumstances permit.

Capital Transfer Tax

31. Mr. Maude asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost of collecting capital transfer tax in each of the last three years.

Mr. Moore: The estimated cost of collecting capital transfer tax and estate duty is as follows:

	£ million
1981-82	15·7
1982-83	16·2
1983-84	17·1

The cost of collecting capital transfer tax alone is not available.

Oil Revenues

32. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the proportion of Her Majesty's Government's oil revenues expended in Scotland.

Mr. Peter Rees: Individual sources of revenue are not allocated to particular kinds of expenditure; there is no administrative relationship between oil revenues and expenditure in Scotland.

Economic Growth

33. Mr. Forman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is satisfied with the rate of growth of national output.

Mr. Peter Rees: Yes. Between the second quarter of 1983 and 1984 GDP, on the average measure grew by 3 per cent. For 1984 as a whole GDP is expected to be 4 per cent. above the pre-recession peak year of 1979. GDP is expected to grow by 3½ per cent. in 1985.

Employment Forecast

35. Mr. Fatchett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the forecast level of unemployment for November 1985.

Mr. Hayhoe: In recent years Governments have not provided forecasts of unemployment. Progress on jobs will depend crucially on realistic pay settlements.

Sterling-Dollar Exchange Rate

36. Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied that the current value of sterling against the dollar reflects the genuine value of British exports to the United States of America.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The strength of the dollar against all currencies reflects the response of competitive market forces to a number of factors including high United States interest rates.

Coal Industry Dispute

37. Mr. Strang asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the cost of the industrial dispute in the coal industry.

Mr. Peter Rees: If the strike were to end at Christmas, it would add some £1·5 billion to the PSBR for 1984-85. The public expenditure planning total would be exceeded by about the same amount.

Monetary Targets

38. Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he intends to change his monetary targets.

Mr. Peter Rees: We have at present no plans to do so.

Export (Control) Order (Infringements)

39. Mr. Ashdown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number of instances of compoundings on administrative settlements as a result of infringements of the Export (Control) Order relating to the export of high technology electronic items and associated goods since 1978.

Mr. Hayhoe: Customs and Excise has compounded proceedings for offences arising out of infringements of the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1981 on 99 occasions since 1978. Information is not available about the number of these which relate to high technology electronic items.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

40. Mr. Maples asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his most recent estimate for the current year's public sector borrowing requirement.

Mr. Peter Rees: £8½ billion, as published in the autumn statement.

WALES

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information his Department has on the incidence of cervical cancer in Wales in the past three years.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The numbers of new registrations of cervical cancer (ICD Code 180) in Welsh residents were as follows:

	Numbers
1980	334
1981	343
1982	247

The figure for 1982 under-represents the true position of those registrations, normally obtained from the hospital activity analysis system, which were not recorded in 1982 because of industrial action.

Dairy Industry

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the present state of the dairy industry in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The dairy industry in Wales is passing through a difficult period as a result of the long dry summer and the introduction of the milk quota scheme. However, the measures we have introduced, including the reserve for special cases and the outgoers scheme, will help to ameliorate the effects of quotas on those most harshly affected and the industry will have a sounder base from which to plan for the future. In addition, the aid to small milk producers scheme is being continued for a further two years and many dairy producers will benefit from the extension of the less favoured areas.

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has regarding the current levels of milk production in Ireland, France and Germany; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The latest published information on deliveries of cows milk to dairies in Ireland, France and Germany is shown in the following table. The figures exclude on-farm use, use for animal feed and in general use for direct sales. The data are provisional and are therefors subject to amendment.

Table: Cows Milk Delivered to Dairies, 1984
'000 tonnes

	April	May	June	July	August
Ireland	638·30	835·50	773·70	694·74	592·40
France	2,515·40	2,844·10	2,561·40	2,295·60	1,966·10
Germany	2,303·70	2,446·99	2,185·60	2,108·06	1,936·00

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has now received a comprehensive report from the European Economic Community regarding the application of the quota system for milk in other member states; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) on 14 November 1984, at columns 295-96.

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many dairy farmers in Wales and in the Vale of Glamorgan, respectively, have applied under the outgoers scheme; how many in each case have been rejected; and what further consideration may be possible in cases which were rejected.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: There were 728 applications under the current milk outgoers scheme in Wales, of which 12 were in the district of the Vale of Glamorgan.

No dairy producer who made a valid application within the terms of the scheme has yet been rejected. Offers have so far been made to applicants with individual quotas of up to 250,000 litres (but excluding those in which milk production accounted for only a small proportion of the farm business). Further offers are likely to be made to progressively larger producers as some of those provisionally accepted withdraw their applications or are found not to be fully eligible to participate.

Agricultural Grants

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if, following the autumn statement, he will list the consequences in financial terms of the cutback in agricultural grants in Wales in 1984-85 and 1985-86; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: There are no reductions in the provision for 1984-85 as a result of the autumn statement. Following the changes announced in that statement the planned expenditure on agriculture in 1985-86 for which I am responsible shows a net reduction of £17 million. This net figure results from increases and decreases in a number of areas, but the largest element is a net reduction of some £16 million in the forecast demand for schemes pre-funded by the European Community.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will indicate the amount of cash cuts in his allocation for 1984-85 and 1985-86 for (a) local authority housing and (b) urban aid consequent upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: There are no cash cuts in 1984-85 as a consequence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement. I have not yet decided on the allocation to particular services, including local authority housing and urban aid, for 1985-86. I shall make my decisions known in due course.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) in what areas of his Department's spending programme he has used his discretion to make allocations of the overall expenditure allocated to his Department which take account of local factors as set out in paragraph 2.24 of the autumn statement; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what are the outline public expenditure plans for Wales for 1985-86; and if he will publish details in the Official Report under each expenditure head in a form comparable with that in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's autumn statement indicating spending plans in Wales on agriculture, forestry commission, trade and industry, energy, employment, transport, housing, the urban programme, education and science, arts and libraries, health, personal social services and other areas for which he has responsibility, respectively.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The latest outline public expenditure plans for services within my responsibility will be found in table 2.16 of the 1984 public expenditure White Paper, Cmnd. 9143. I am now reviewing those plans following the autumn statement. My decisions will be published in the form of revised plans in the 1985 public expenditure White Paper.

EMPLOYMENT

Long-term Unemployment

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on his new initiatives to reduce long-term unemployment.

Mr. Alan Clark: The only way permanently to reduce long-term unemployment is to maintain the Government's economic policies, which are the best guarantee of sustainable growth in output and jobs. My right hon. Friend described the latest developments in the Government's employment and training measures on 12 November, at column 444.

Wages Inspectors (Inspections)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish, for the most recent year available, information on the numbers and proportions of inspections in Scotland by wages inspectors, the number of workers whose pay was examined, and the percentage found to be underpaid, the number of workers paid arrears, and the total amount of arrears paid, dividing the numbers and proportions into (a) those which included a visit to the establishment and (b) those which were carried out by post.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The pay of workers at 5,294 establishments in Scotland covered by wages councils was checked by wages inspectors in 1983. This represents 13·7 per cent. of the number on the Wages Inspectorate's register. Details of the checks and the outcome are given in the following table.

	Pay checks involving a visit	Pay checks not involving a visit		Total
		Postal	Other
Establishments checked	2,939 (56 per cent.)	493 (9 per cent.)	1,862 (35 per cent.)	5,294
Workers whose pay checked	16,920 (52 per cent.)	1,885 (6 per cent.)	13,450 (42 per cent.)	32,255

The figures for postal and other checks not involving a visit relate only to establishments where the check proved satisfactory.

	Figures
Percentage of workers found to be underpaid following a visit	11·6 per cent.
Percentage of workers found to be underpaid as a result of all checks	6·1 per cent.
Workers for whom arrears assessed	1,959
Amount of arrears assessed	£217,317
Workers to whom arrears paid	1,767
Amount of arrears paid	£179,777

A detailed explanation of the inspectorate's method of checking pay and the results in 1983 is given in pages 451 and 452 of the October 1984 issue of Employment Gazette, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the latest unemployment figures.

Mr. Alan Clark: At 11 October the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 3,225,000.

The Government are concerned about the level of unemployment, and some 689,000 people are currently benefiting from our employment and training measures. However, sustainable employment depends on a healthy economy, competitive industry and a more flexible labour market. Our policies are directed to those ends and we continue to look for ways of building on what has been achieved so far.

One important influence on firms' competitiveness is the level of wages, and the Government believe that moderating the growth in real earnings will have a significant impact on unemployment.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide the most recent figures for unemployment in the Leeds district by postcode areas; how many of these were women; and by how much each figure has changed in the last 12 months.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is not available in the form requested except at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the increase in the number of unemployed people since May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: On 11 October 1984 the number of unemployed people (including school leavers) in the United Kingdom was 3,225,136, an estimated increase of 2,006,200 claimants since May 1979. The figures are affected by the 1983 Budget provisions which enable some men, mainly aged 60 and over, to receive the long-term rate of supplementary benefit and national insurance credits without having to sign on at an unemployment benefit office. Between April and August 1983 an estimated 161,800 men were affected.

Skillcentres

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if a decision has been made to close any Manpower Services Commission sponsored skillcentres.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Manpower Services Commission decided in January this year that it would review the agency's progress towards full cost recovery in the autumn. The commission will discuss this review in December.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what budgets have been set for the skillcentre training agency (training division) of the Manpower Services Commission for (a) 1984-85 and (b) 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The skillcentre training agency trading account budget for 1984-85 is:

	Millions
Expenditure	102·8
Receipts	78·5

Provision has been made to meet a trading account deficit of up to £24 million from the Manpower Service Commission's grant-in-aid.

The agency's budget for 1985-86 has not yet been agreed, but provision will be made to meet a trading account deficit of up to £12 million from the commission's grant-in-aid.

Youth Training (Leeds)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the numbers on youth training schemes in the Leeds area on 1 November and break down by ethnic origin those accepted on such schemes in the last 12 months.

Mr. Peter Morrison: On 1 November 1984 there were 4,148 young people in training on the youth training scheme in the Leeds local authority district.

The following table shows the number of entrants by ethnic origin from 2 November 1983 to 1 November 1984.

Ethnic Origin	Entrants 2 November 83 to 1 November 84
White/European	5,110
African/West Indian	195
Asian	84
Others	34
Total	5,423

Earnings

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report the figures for hourly earnings of (a) manual and (b) all workers in the motor vehicle and components industry compared to (i) all workers and (ii) manufacturing workers for each year since 1970.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following table sets out the available information on the average hourly earnings of full-time adult male employees working a full week based on the "New Earnings Survey" in April of each successive year since 1970.

*Average gross hourly earnings

Pence per hour

	Motor vehicle industry		All employees in

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied that all normal and statutory checks and examinations have been carried out in the last 12 months at all nuclear power stations.

Mr. Goodlad: I have been asked to reply.

Yes, under the licensing arrangements all normal and statutory checks and examinations have been carried out.

ENERGY

Coal and Oil Prices

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what is the average price paid by the Central Electricity Generating Board for (a) coal and (b) oil over the last three months for which figures are available; and how these figures compare with those for the same periods in 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983;

(2) whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for coal and oil delivered to power stations under the control of the Central Electricity Generating Board, in the most recent month or week for which figures are available, the average or a representative price per tonne.

Mr. Goodlad: The latest available information, published in the "Digest of United Kingdom Energy Statistics 1984", shows that the average price of coal and oil burnt at power stations in Great Britain in 1983 was £42·29 and £120·71 per tonne, respectively. The corresponding figures for the earlier years are as follows:

	Coal £	Oil £
1980	31·84	85·73
1981	37·43	107·87
1982	40·21	109·41

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to the landed price of (a) imported coal other than anthracite and (b) imported heavy fuel oil in the latest month for which figures are available for the corresponding month in 1983.

Mr. David Hunt: Information about the price of imported coal and fuel oil can be derived from Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom, which is available in the Library of the House.

Oil Imports (Libya)

Mr. Welsh asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the amount of oil imported into the United Kingdom from Libya since March 1984; and at what cost.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Information about the amounts of oil which have been imported into the United Kingdom is provided in Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom, which is available in the Library of the House.

TRANSPORT

Rural Areas (Signposting)

Mr. Spence asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether the priorities of his recent circular 11/84 dealing with signposting of local tourist facilities in rural areas represents a change of his policy with regard to the introduction of such signs.

Mrs. Chalker: No. Department of the Environment circular 11/84 gives advice on the planning considerations governing the erection off highway land of signs advertising nearby tourist attractions. On grounds of safety, highway authorities do not normally allow such commercial advertisements within the highway boundary. Directional signs to tourist attractions must either be prescribed in the Traffic Signs Regulations and General Directions 1981 or specially authorised by the Secretary of State for Transport. We have already prescribed some signs for tourist attractions and are experimenting with different designs in Kent and Nottinghamshire.

A11 (Norfolk)

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now give a higher priority to the conversion to dual carriageway of the A11 road in Norfolk.

Mrs. Chalker: There are a number of schemes in the trunk road programme for improving the A11 between Newmarket and Norwich. Where they can be economically justified, dual carriageways will be provided. Also, as I undertook in replying to the Adjournment debate on 6 November, at columns 97-104, initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder), those stretches for which there are no schemes in the road programme will be examined to see whether there is a case for a limited length of dualling which can prevent a build-up of long platoons of slow-moving traffic.

Passenger Transport

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the number of stage journeys on public passenger road transport in 1983.

Mr. David Mitchell: The number of stage journeys on public road passenger transport in 1983 was 5,550 million.

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the level of stage service fares for all bus operators in each of the years 1964 to 1984 expressed in constant prices.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department does not collect national data on the level of stage service fares; instead, it collects information on changes in stage service fares from which it calculates a fares index. The index for all bus operators in Great Britain in each of the years 1964 to 1984 relative to 31 December 1973 = 100 and deflated by the retail prices index was as follows:

Year

Schoolchildren (Accident Statistics)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is able to estimate the number of schoolchildren involved in fatal or serious road accidents on their way to and from school; what measures are currently in force to restrict the speed of, and warn, motorists in the vicinity of school gates; and how these measures compare with the practice in other countries of the European Economic Community, the United States of America and Australia.

Mrs. Chalker: In 1983, 11,180 children, age 16 and under, were casualties while travelling to or from school, of which 96 and 2,636 were involved in fatal accidents and serious accidents respectively. The 73 children killed included 58 pedestrians and 12 cyclists; the 2,409 children seriously injured included 1,814 pedestrians and 409 cyclists.

School-related speed limits have been suggested before, but examination of the idea leaves me very doubtful that they would have any safety benefit. Such periodic, low speed limits would be confusing to drivers; permanent low speed limits would tend to be ignored because they would be seen to be irrelevant much of the time. The use of "School Ahead" warning signs and yellow zig-zag markings are a better approach to securing greater awareness on the part of motorists of the need for extra care and attention.

Measures adopted in other countries reflect particular national conditions and requirements and would not necessarily be suited for implementation here.

Transport Supplementary Grant

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that changes in transport supplementary grant do not lead to a lower standard of road maintenance.

Mrs. Chalker: There is no reason why the changes in the transport supplementary grant system should affect the standard of local authority road maintenance. Local authorities' current expenditure will continue to be supported through block grant and individual authorities are free to decide their own priorities.

Pilotage

Mr. Thornton asked the Secretary of State for Transport on how many occasions in the last 25 years he has used his powers under section 78 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 to grant a dispensation from compulsory pilotage; and what were the circumstances on each occasion.

Mr. David Mitchell: I shall answer this question shortly.

SCOTLAND

Education Expenditure

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information his Department has on the expenditure on education per pupil in the grant-aided and independent sector in the latest year; and if he will disaggregate the figures for primary and secondary sectors.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This information is not held centrally.

Departmental Computers

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the type and country of origin of manufacture of the computers in use at the Scottish Office; and what was their purchase cost.

Mr. Younger: The Scottish Office has two model 3032 mainframe computers manufactured in France by International Business Machines Ltd. They were purchased separately in 1979 and 1980 and cost £1,633,101 and £1,054,303, respectively.

Equipment peripheral to the mainframe computers and purchased over a period of years was also manufactured by IBM and cost £2,147,726. It had a number of countries of origin including the United Kingdom, United States of America, West Germany and Sweden.

The Scottish Office also uses 145 micro and minicomputers purchased over a period of some years from a variety of manufacturers including Apple Computer (UK) Ltd., Commodore Business Machines (UK) Ltd., Comart Ltd., Cromenco Ltd., Digital Equipment Co. Ltd., Hewlett Packard Ltd., International Business Machines (UK) Ltd., International Computers Ltd. and Lucas Industries Ltd. No central record is held of purchase costs or country of origin of manufacture.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the parliamentary constituencies in Scotland by (a) total percentage unemployment rate and (b) male percentage unemployment rate from the 1981 census.

Mr. John MacKay: The percentages of men aged 16 to 64 and women aged 16 to 59 in each parliamentary constituency who were classified in the 1981 census as "out of employment" are given in tables E and F respectively of the "Paliamentary Constituency Monitor, 1983 Boundaries, Scotland", a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Unemployment (Dundee)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the figures showing the number and percentage unemployed in the Dundee travel-to-work area; and if he will publish similar figures for the district wards within the travel-to-work area.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend's letter to him of 22 October. Unemployment data by travel-to-work area are now available in the House of Commons Library; totals for individual wards will be made available from mid 1985.

Private Nursing Homes

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the public or professional bodies which regulate the establishment of private nursing homes in Scotland; and if he will make a statement on the safeguards to ensure that an adequate standard of service is provided by these homes.

Mr. John MacKay: In addition to applying to the local planning authority concerned for any planning permission which may be necessary, persons seeking to establish a private nursing home or hospital are required to apply for registration to the health board for the area in which it is to be located. Private hospital developments of 120 beds or more require the specific authorisation of the Secretary of State. As registering authorities, health boards are empowered by the Nursing Home Registration (Scotland) Act 1938, as amended, and associated regulations, to inspect the registered establishments in their area at regular intervals to ensure that adequate standards of care and accommodation are provided and maintained.

Schaw Hospital, Bearsden

Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to make an announcement on the future of Schaw hospital, Bearsden.

Mr. John MacKay: I hope to be able to reply very shortly to Greater Glasgow health board's application to close and dispose of this hospital.

Teachers

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about proposed changes in the scope of grant aid towards the in-service training of teachers.

Mr. Younger: I have today laid before Parliament the Education (Grants for In-Service Training of Teachers) (Scotland) Amendment Regulations 1984, which add to the list of subject areas in which attendance by teachers at in-service courses may attract grant aid in the current financial year. The added courses, all of which are among the national courses sponsored for 1985 by the National Committee for In-Service Training of Teachers, are related to management of staff development, writing of course modules in physical education, and the curriculum for young people with severe mental handicap.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Tristan da Cunha (Electricity Generation)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to how electricity is generated on Tristan da Cunha.

Mr. Renton: Tristan da Cunha's electricity supply is provided by diesel generators owned by a private firm Tristan Investments Ltd. About 500 MWH/year are produced. In addition, there is a small emergency generator.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ethiopia

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much bilateral aid, in monetary terms, Great Britain has given to Ethiopia in every year since 1974.

Mr. Raison: The details are as follows:

Figures of aid to the Ethiopian Government and through voluntary relief agencies working throughout Ethiopia

	£'000
1974	2,058
1975	2,909
1976	2,332
1977	1,726
1978	2,766
1979	2,763
1980	1,969
1981	166
1982	5,300
1983	3,037

Note:
This includes development loans and grants, disaster relief and technical co-operation, but excludes aid channelled through the European Community, the World Food Programme and other multilateral agencies.

Turkey

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all aid given to Turkey since 1979.

Mr. Raison: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) on 20 February, at column 392, in which I said that disbursements on British bilateral aid to Turkey since 1979 were as follows:

	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983
Project Aid	114	—	295	446	—
Programme aid	—	7,585	21,185	12,533	3,309
Debt Refinancing	3,723	—	10,158	3,327	1,634
Disaster Relief	10	13	—	—	89
Technical Co-operation	406	437	470	576	365
Total	4,253	8,035	32,108	16,882	5,397

In addition, Turkey benefits from aid from the European Community. Expenditure is now taking place from the third financial protocol and from a special aid package. The third financial protocol provides 220 million ecu for loans on special terms from the Community budget and 90 million ecu of loans from the European Investment Bank's own resources. The United Kingdom share of the aid financed from the budget is about £28 million. At the end of 1983 expenditure on special loans from the budget amounted to 108 million ecu (of which the United Kingdom share was about £14 million). The special aid package for 50 million ecu, of which the United Kingdom share is about £6 million.

Heroin

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in co-operation with the Government of Pakistan in preventing the export of heroin from that country; and what further assistance Her Majesty's Government will give for the replacing of poppy cultivation by other crops.

Mr. Raison: We co-operate closely with the Government of Pakistan and other Governments in an international programme aimed at reducing the export of heroin from Pakistan. The amount of opium grown in Pakistan has reduced from 800 tons in 1979 to an estimated 40 to 45 tons this year. Our customs liaison officer in Pakistan has provided information which has led to a number of arrests.

I shall consider the possibility of giving further assistance in the light of the progress of our current programme of assistance for crop substitution.

Aid Statistics

Mr. Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total of aid given by means of non-returnable grant, whether in cash or kind, for the year 1983-84; and what proportion this was of the United Kingdom's total aid budget.

Mr. Raison: Total aid in the form of grants in 1983-84 was £1,028 million, amounting to 93 per cent. of the gross aid programme.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what estimates the Overseas Development Agency drought unit has made of the shortfall of basic grain feedstuffs in each region in Ethiopia; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what estimates have been made by the Overseas Development Agency drought unit of the number of persons affected by the lack of rainfall in Ethiopia over the past four years.

Mr. Raison: The task of making such assessments lies primarily with the Ethiopian authorities and relevant international agencies such as the Food and Agriculture Organisation and the World Food Programme.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what long-term initiatives the Overseas Development Agency drought unit has formulated to combat drought in Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: Any long-term policy will have to be examined on a co-ordinated basis between potential donors and the Ethiopian Government. My administration is concentrating on the immediate delivery of relief supplies of all kinds.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received or expects to be proposed by the Overseas Development Agency drought unit on the results of the 1984 harvest and the prospects for the 1985 harvest in Ethiopia.

Mr. Raison: A crop assessment mission from the Food and Agricultural Organisation is now in Ethiopia, and we expect to receive an account of its findings.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the European Economic Community to establish when European Economic Community grain committed to Ethiopia will arrive at Assab, Massawa or Djibouti; when it is likely to be in famine areas in Ethiopia; and what is the timetable being proposed.

Mr. Raison: My officials keep in close touch with those of the European Commission. 10,000 tonnes of grain agreed by the European Community last month as emergency aid will arrive in Ethiopia in mid-December. A further 25,000 tonnes emergency aid announced on 13 November will arrive by the end of December. 25,000 tonnes for a food for work project will arrive in two shipments in February and April next year. The European Commission's intention is to ship in addition 10,000 tonnes a month to Ethiopia throughout 1985, but this depends on agreement by the member states on the 1985 food aid programme. We are continuing to press urgently for a decision. I have no doubt that the voluntary organisations and Ethiopian Government agencies who will handle the grain on its arrival will make every effort to ensure it gets to the affected areas quickly.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what discussions he has had with the World Food Programme in Rome about likely arrivals of grain at Assab, Massawa or Djibouti for Ethiopia in November, December and January; and what is his estimate of the level of grain stocks at each of these ports to be moved by road and by air lift;

(2) how much grain the Royal Air Force has so far airlifted in Ethiopia; how much he now expects it to be able to move per day; and whether he is satisfied sufficient grain will arrive at ports in Ethiopia or Djibouti in the rest of November, December and January to keep the United Kingdom and other airlifts working to full capacity.

Mr. Raison: The most reliable estimates available to me based on discussions with the World Food Programme indicate that grain arrivals at Assab will 26,300 tonnes in November, 86,000 tonnes in December and 52,700 tonnes in January. In addition, approximately 40,000 tonnes of grain are currently in stock at Assab, which is being removed from the port at the rate of about 3,000 tonnes a day. There is no clear information available on future arrivals at Massawa or Djibouti, but I understand there are no significant stocks of grain for Ethiopia at either port.

By 12 November the Royal Air Force had airlifted about 450 tonnes of grain in Ethiopia. On average each of the two Hercules expect to move about 40 tonnes a day.

St. Helena

Mr. Stuart Holland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the value per head of the Government's aid programme to St. Helena.

Mr. Raison: The 1983 figure was approximately £1,300 per head.

Aid Level

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received regarding the future level of overseas aid in the light of increased famine conditions in the Third world; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The Government have received represenations from the Catholic Fund for Overseas Development, Christian Aid, Euro-Action-Accord, Oxfam, Save the Children Fund, War on Want, World Development Movement, Members of Parliament and individuals. It is the Government's intention to maintain a substantial aid programme. An announcement will shortly be made about its level for 1985-86.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future of the budget for overseas aid following the Chancellor's autumn statement.

Mr. Raison: The Government intend to maintain a substantial aid programme. An announcement will shortly be made about its level for 1985-86.

Aid (Allocation Criteria)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the developmental criteria and relevant commercial and political factors which he takes into account in deciding on the allocation of aid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The fundamental objective of the aid programme is to promote sustainable economic and social progress and to alleviate poverty in developing countries particularly the poorest ones. While pursuing this aim we endeavour to assist the export of British goods and services primarily through tying much of our aid to their procurement. We believe that a substantial bilateral aid programme is an important aspect of our wider political relationship with developing countries.

DEFENCE

Cruise Missile

69. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is satisfied with the progress of the cruise missile programme.

Mr. Stanley: The deployment programme for ground-launched cruise missiles in the United Kingdom is proceeding satisfactorily.

Red Sea (Mines)

70. Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will report to the House the conclusions of the investigations into the incidents whereby mines were laid in international waterways in the Red sea; whether the retrieval of one mine by British minesweepers has revealed its origin and those responsible for its laying; and what protests he has made.

71. Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what has been revealed from the mine retrieved from the Red sea by a British minesweeper; and what protest has been made to those responsible.

Mr. Stanley: The mine recovered by the Royal Navy from Egyptian territorial waters in the Gulf of Suez was of Soviet manufacture, but we do not know who was responsible for laying it. It has therefore not been possible for any protests to be made.

Anglo-Italian Collaborative Projects

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those Anglo-Italian collaborative defence projects (a) completed, (b) currently being undertaken and (c) publicly committed to; and if he will express each in terms of total cost and numbers involved.

Mr. Butler: The EH101 helicopter project, development of which was launched earlier this year, is the first major programme to be undertaken bilaterally by the United Kingdom and Italy.

Our two countries have, however, collaborated jointly with Germany on Tornado and on the FH70 and SP70 gun projects. The first two of these equipments are now in service with the armed forces of the three nations, while the third is still in development. The United Kingdom and Italy are also working, together with other NATO countries, on a number of multilateral collaborative projects, including:

Sidewinder Aim 9L	Co-production projects
MLRS Phase 1
European Fighter Aircraft	Early Feasibility Studies in progress
NATO Frigate NFR 90

It is not the practice to provide information on costs and estimated production numbers for projects of this nature.

Shoeburyness Establishment

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made in the preparations for contracting out certain services at the defence establishment in Shoeburyness; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Invitations to tender are being prepared for contractor operation of stores and transport, range services and some administrative functions at the proof and experimental establishment, Shoeburyness. It is intended to invite tenders early in the new year, with a view to implementation on 1 April 1986.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Young asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the extra cost of the air transport communications with the Falklands per return flight (a) from the United Kingdom to Ascension Island and (b) from Ascension Island to the Falklands; and how these costs are compared.

Mr. Stanley: The estimated extra cost of a return aircraft flight from the United Kingdom to Ascension Island by VC10 is £60,000 and from Ascension Island to the Falkland Islands by Hercules, including tanker support, £80,000.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Defence what requests have been made to individual owner-occupied farms in the Falkland Islands for leases of land for military training purposes; what is the basis of rent or compensation offered; and what similar requests or arrangements have been entered into with the Falkland Islands Company.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

Procurement Expenditure (Scotland)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the share of procurement expenditure on equipment purchased in Scotland in (a) 1981-82, (b) 1982-83 and (c) 1983-84.

Mr. Butler: We estimate that the proportion of defence equipment procurement expenditure spent in Scotland is as follows:

	per cent.
1981-82	7
1982-83	7
1983-84	6

These figures are for direct payments to main contractors and do not take account of payments made to subcontractors in Scotland. Expenditure on international collaborative projects is also excluded from these figures.

Tornado

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Tornado aircraft have been destroyed or seriously damaged in accidents since its introduction into operational service; and how that figure compares with the expected attrition rate at this stage.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

General Belgrano and HMS Conqueror

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether questions from hon. Members on the sinking of the General Belgrano and the whereabouts of HMS Conqueror were answered without reference to the navigator's log book of HMS Conqueror.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 13 November.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the missing log of HMS Conqueror contains (a) the time at which the General Belgrano was first sighted, (b) any information relating to the course of the General Belgrano after it was sighted, (c) the time at which the General Belgrano was attacked by HMS Conqueror, (d) information relating to the damage sustained to the General Belgrano from the attack, (e) the times of signals to and from Northwood and (f) information relating to the contents of signals to and from Northwood.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Member to the specimen copy of a control room log which I have placed in the Library. He will see from that that it is unlikely that the missing control room log from HMS Conqueror contains any of the information listed. This is recorded in other documents; primarily the captain's account.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any information contained in the missing log of HMS Conqueror is not contained in the captain's log.

Mr. Heseltine: Yes. As can be seen from the uncompleted log in the Library, the control room log contains routine information and instrument readings at hourly intervals which would not be recorded in the captain's account.

Nuclear Submarines (Logs)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence at what intervals (a) captain's, (b) navigational and (c) signals logs are removed from nuclear submarines; and what is the procedure for dealing with each of them after they are removed.

Mr. Heseltine: Submarine commanding officers submit a report to their operational commanders at the end of each patrol. These reports are supported by detailed records including narrative accounts of operations and exercises. Instructions for handling completed submarine control room logs are in Queen's Regulations for the Royal Navy which are available in the Library. Signal logs are not retained permanently.

Greenham Common

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence why armed United States soldiers were allowed directly to confront Greenham common women cutting their way through the inner security fence at the cruise missile base on Sunday 5 November.

Mr. Stanley: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to the incident on 4 November which was described in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson) on 9 November, at column 41. United States personnel were on duty inside the cruise missile facility within the base but all the women concerned were apprehended outside the facility by British personnel.

Nimrod Early Warning

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the Nimrod airborne early warning to be fully operational; what will be the total cost per plane; and how the figure differs from the original estimate upon signing of contracts.

Mr. Butler: It is neither our policy to reveal the dates on which defence systems become fully operational nor to divulge information which is commercially confidential.

Low-flying Aircraft (Welsh National Parks)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any A-10, F1-11, Tornado or Jaguar aircraft have taken part in low-flying exercises over Welsh national parks in accordance with the "follow-on force attack" concept under development by the Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers in Europe.

Mr. Stanley: As I explained to the House in the debate on Adjournment on 31 October, the follow-on force attack concept is a guide to long term planning and not to the detailed conduct of exercises.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether United States air force aircraft carry out low-flying exercises over Welsh national parks according to either the inter-service agreement on joint attack of the second echelon or the memorandum of understanding on joint US Army/US air force efforts for enhancement of joint employment of the airland battle doctrine.

Mr. Stanley: These documents relate to the development of US national doctrine for joint employment of land and air forces, which has not been exercised in this country.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any aircraft of the United States air force in Europe have taken part in low-flying exercises over Welsh national parks; and whether all such exercises have been NATO exercises.

Mr. Stanley: There have been no major low-flying exercises involving aircraft of the United States air force in Europe flying over Welsh national parks this year. However, day-to-day routine training of USAF aircraft based in the United Kingdom includes low-level overflights of most parts of the country, including Welsh national parks.

Cyprus

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many residents from each of (a) the southern part of Cyprus and (b) the northern part of Cyprus now work at the United Kingdom sovereign base of Dekhelia in Cyprus;

(2) how many Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots are now employed at the United Kingdom sovereign base in Dekhelia, Cyprus.

Mr. Butler: There are 880 Greek Cypriots and 337 Turkish Cypriots currently employed at the eastern sovereign base area, Dekhelia. Apart from a small number who live in the United Nations buffer zone, all the Turkish Cypriots reside in the so-called Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus—with the exception of three who are resident in the base itself—and all the Greek Cypriots reside either in the Republic of Cyprus south of the buffer zone or in the base.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots are employed at the United Kingdom sovereign base in Akrotiri, Cyprus.

Mr. Butler: There are currently 1,980 Greek Cypriots and no Turkish Cypriots at the western sovereign base area, Akrotiri.

Army Cataloguing Authority

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many professional and technical staff of the Army cataloguing authority have so far volunteered to move to Glasgow; and how many qualified staff have so far been recruited in the Glasgow area.

Mr. Butler: Eleven professional and technical staff have so far opted to go to Glasgow, together with a further 23 recruited internally in the MOD. A total of 15 qualified applicants for posts with the ACA have so far been successful at external recruitment boards held in Glasgow.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to be able to announce the results of his review of the proposed dispersal of the Army cataloguing authority to Glasgow.

Mr. Butler: I expect to make a statement on the outcome of this review of dispersal policy shortly.

Military Installations (Deaths and Injuries)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many non-military people have been injured or killed whilst visiting military installations, in the past five years.

Mr. Stanley: The information requested will take some time to assemble. My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write to my hon. Friend.

HMS Conqueror

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has received the report of the board of inquiry investigating the missing log of HMS Conqueror; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: No. On the question of a statement, I refer the hon. Gentleman to my answer to him of 13 November.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will institute court martial proceedings against the captain or any other crew member of HMS Conqueror, following the loss of the navigator's log book; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: I cannot prejudge the outcome of the board of inquiry. On the question of a statement, I refer the hon. Gentleman to my answer of 13 November, at column 228, to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes).

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Defence from what date the new navigator's log book of HMS Conqueror has been kept.

Mr. Heseltine: The control room log of a submarine is kept continuously. As my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces said in another place on 7 November, the period covered by the missing sections of the log is April to September 1982.

NATO (Conventional Defence Doctrine)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he expects the next meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers to discuss changes in conventional defence doctrine.

Mr. Stanley: NATO's strategy of flexible response and forward defence remains valid and no change to it, is in prospect. We would expect Ministers at their December meeting to take stock on a range of defence planning business concerned with the effective implementation of that strategy in the light of the developing Warsaw pact threat.

NATO Exercises

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation exercises which have been carried out in Europe to date in 1984; and whether any of them involved Pershing II missiles.

Mr. Stanley: Security considerations prevent me from publishing a comphrehensive list of NATO exercises and detailing the involvement of particular nuclear systems.

501st Tactical Missile Wing

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy that deployment exercises carried out by the 501st Tactical Missile Wing outside the perimeter of Greenham common, take place with unarmed cruise missiles.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1983", paragraph 209.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he is satisfied with the participation of British service men in the field exercises of the 501st Tactical Missile Wing at Greenham common.

Mr. Stanley: Yes.

United States Forces (Exercises)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether United States forces in the United Kingdom have taken part in exercises in accordance with the joint United States army—United States air force memorandum of understanding entitled, "Efforts for Enhancement of Joint Employment of the Airland Battle Doctrine", agreed on 21 April 1983.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 12 November 1984, c. 152]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to a question from the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas).

Airland Battle Doctrine

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence in what way the United States airland battle doctrine is incompatible with NATO doctrine.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 12 November 1984, c. 155]: Airland battle, which is spelt out in United States field manual 100-5, is the US army's tactical doctrine for dealing with the contingencies it might face around the world, not just in Europe. There are, therefore, aspects, such as jungle warfare, which do not apply to NATO. Airland battle is not agreed NATO doctrine and the manual makes clear that US army forces will operate in Europe under NATO procedures and principles. The question of incompatibility within NATO does not, therefore, arise.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the airland battle doctrine has been discussed by NATO ambassadors in the defence planning committee.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 12 November 1984, c. 155]: Airland battle, as the doctrine set out in the US army's field manual 100-5 is known, is official US army, and not NATO, doctrine. It has not been introduced for formal consideration by NATO authorities, though the allies have naturally been made aware of it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Deakins asked the Lord Privy Seal what has been the average number of written questions answered on each sitting day in the 1983-84 Session; and what has been the trend in this figure in recent years.

Mr. Biffen: The number of sitting days in each Session and the total number of notices of questions for written answer which appeared on the Order Paper during each Session since 1977-78 is given, together with the average per sitting day, in the following table:

	Sitting Days	Notices of Questions	Average per Sitting Day
1977-78	169	28,630	169
1978-79	86	12,952	151
1979-80	244	39,912	164
1980-81	163	22,688	139
1981-82	174	23,439	135
1982-83	115	17,095	149
1983-84	213	40,119	188

Harcourt Room

Mr. Dubs asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will list the occasions during the last 12 months when the Harcourt Room was not available at meal times for hon. Members; and what was the nature of the functions which were held instead.

Mr. Biffen: Under the general regulations regarding the booking of dining rooms, the Harcourt Room may be reserved by Members for private entertaining on Mondays and Fridays at lunchtime, provided alternative accommodation is available for Members. During the last 12 months, the Harcourt Room has been reserved in this way on 30 occasions. It is not the Refreshment Department's practice to make public information which may be available to it on the nature of functions sponsored by hon. Members.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Council of Finance Ministers

Mr. Maples asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the 12 November meeting of the European Council of Finance Ministers.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I represented the United Kingdom at the meeting of the Council of Economic and Finance Ministers in Brussels on 12 November.

The Council reached agreement on a common position on measures to guarantee the effective application of the guidelines on budgetary discipline adopted by the Brussels and Fontainebleau European Councils. The intention is that a final text will be formally adopted as conclusions of the Council of Ministers after a meeting with a delegation from the European Parliament to be held on 21 November.

The text agreed by the ECOFIN Council incorporates the European Council guidelines into the Community's budgetary procedures and contains provisions to ensure that in future the rate of growth of net expenditure relating to agricultural markets will be less than the rate of growth of the own resources base. The agreement thus achieves the Government's objectives on budgetary discipline. The text of the Council's common position will be made available to Parliament as soon as possible.

The Council also discussed the position to be adopted by the Community in discussion in the OECD on export credits for aircraft and mixed credits. These issues were referred to COREPER for futher consideration.

The Council had a preliminary discussion of the setting of a new multiannual ceiling for FEOGA Guidance expenditure.

The Council invited COREPER to prepare a report on a Commission proposal to harmonise the income tax regime applicable to Community residents living in one member state and working in another.

Civil Servants (Customs and Excise Grades)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many civil servants are employed in Her Majesty's Customs and Excise grades; what is the total inclusive cost of their employment; and if he will provide similar information for each of the previous five years.

Mr. Hayhoe: At 1 October 1984 Her Majesty's Customs and Excise employed a total of 25,570 staff. I am not sure what my hon. Friend has in mind in his request for the total inclusive cost of their employment, but the following table provides information for each of the last five years with costs based on (1) total staff remuneration and employers' national insurance contributions and superannuation costs and (2) the total cost of Customs and Excise administration including accommodation and other services:

	Total staff (31 March)	Costs (1) £ million	(2) £ million
1979-80	27,273	194·3	245·7
1980-81	26,861	238·1	299·7
1981-82	26,256	259·7	334·8
1982-83	25,702	272·8	353·3
1983-84	25,309	283·3	365·8

Interest Rates

Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on the current level of interest rates.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst).

Charities (VAT)

Mr. Maclean asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will estimate the number of charities which are currently liable to pay value added tax;

(2) if he will estimate the amount of revenue which would be lost by exempting charities from value added tax.

Mr. Hayhoe: I refer my hon. Friend to my replies of 2 March, at column 365, to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence).

Cannabis

Mr. Terlezki asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what instructions have been given by his Department to customs officers concerning the prosecution of people coming into the country with small amounts of cannabis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hayhoe: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise has given instructions to its officers at certain ports and airports that, for illegal importations of not more than 10 grams of cannabis, the importer may be offered the option of compounding proceedings under section 152 of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979.

European Currency Unit

Mr. Jackson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress was noted, and what discussions took place, at the meeting on 12 November of the European Community Council of Economic and Finance Ministers with regard to the development of the public and private ecu.

Mr. Ian Stewart: This was not discussed at the meeting of Economic and Finance Ministers on 12 November.

Hotels

Mr. Freeson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what activities of hotels are categorised as non-trading for tax purposes;

(2) what activities of guest houses are categorised as non-trading for tax purposes;

(3) what activities of boarding houses are categorised as non-trading for tax purposes.

Mr. Lawson: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Money Transfer

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all measures taken by him since March 1981, including provisions in Finance Acts, which (a) affect the incomes of individuals or companies in the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man and (b) affect the transfer and subsequent taxation of money from the United Kingdom to the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man.

Mr. Moore: Like other taxpayers, individuals and companies resident in the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man who have United Kingdom income are affected by a very wide range of provisions in Finance Acts. The following tax measures enacted since March 1981 may be particularly relevant to the transfer, and subsequent taxation, of money from the United Kingdom to the Channel Islands and Isle of Man:

Sections 45 and 46, Finance Act 1981 (transfer of assets abroad);
Sections 80 to 84, Finance Act 1981 (capital gains of non-resident settlements);
Section 12, Finance (No. 2) Act 1983 (domicile);
Section 76, Finance Act 1984 (insurance policies issued outside the United Kingdom);
Sections 82 to 91, Finance Act 1984 (controlled foreign companies); and Sections 92 to 100, Finance Act 1984 (offshore funds).

Low-tax Areas

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the effect on the economy of low-tax areas and, in particular, the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man.

Mr. Moore: We are concerned about all tax-induced distortions of the economy, including those arising from the existence of low tax areas.

Channel Islands and the Isle of Man (Taxation)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the effect on revenue to the Exchequer for each year since 1979 of the tax laws in operation in the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man.

Mr. Moore: I regret that this information is not available.

"Official Report"

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the missing sections of the Official Report prior to volume No. 52 will be issued in bound form.

Mr. Hayhoe: The only two such volumes not yet published are Nos. 30 and 43, Sessional Indexes for 1981-82 and 1982-83 respectively. It is expected that volume 30 will be published at the end of November 1984 and volume 43 in February 1985.

Starter Batteries

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish correct figures for imports of starter batteries from Japan and Taiwan for 1984; if he will explain how the errors arose; and if he is satisfied that these imports are now being properly recorded.

Mr. Hayhoe: Yes, the necessary corrections will be incorporated in the cumulative figures published in subsequent issues of the United Kingdom Overseas Trade Statistics and in the more detailed statistics obtainable from the Customs and Excise statistical office. The errors arose from a number of incorrect declarations by importers or their agents in which imported starter batteries were wrongly classified. After discussion with the trade association concerned, Customs and Excise statistical office is making arrangements which should help to ensure the future accuracy of the figures.

Exchange Controls

Mr. Canavan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated amount of outflow of investment from Britain as a result of the lifting of exchange controls in 1979.

Mr. Ian Stewart: It is not possible to estimate how much of the increase in overseas investment is due to the lifting of exchange controls.

Industrial Output

Mr. Nellist asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the movement of industrial output (a) per insured worker and (b) per head of the population for each year since May 1979.

Mr. Peter Rees: Information, in index form, on output per person employed in production industries can be found on page 34 of the CSO's monthly publication Economic Trends. Similar figures of output of production industries per head of population can be derived from information on page 26 of Economic Trends and table 1.17 of the "UK National Accounts" 1984 edition. Copies of these publications are available in the Library of the House.

Scottish Bank Notes

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce legislation to make notes issued by Scottish banks legal tender; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. We have no plans to alter the arrangements relating to Scottish bank notes.

Dual Resident Companies

Mr. Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has any plans to review the taxation of dual resident companies.

Mr. Moore: I have authorised the Inland Revenue to publish today a consultative document regarding the tax treatment of dual resident companies. Representations should be sent to the Board of Inland Revenue to arrive, if possible, by 15 January 1985.

This is part of our continuing review of the taxation of international business. Statements on other aspects will be made in due course.

VAT (Take-away Food and Drink)

Mr. Parry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the recent representations made to him by small businesses in respect of the effect of imposing value added tax on hot take-away food.

Mr. Moore: Some 20 letters have been received by Treasury Ministers during the last month or so.

Unemployment (Cost)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will set out in tabular form his best estimate of the average monthly cost to the Exchequer when an adult male worker on average weekly earnings, on the basis of all industries and services covered by the "New Earnings Survey", updated by the average earnings index and assuming pay was not affected by absence, becomes unemployed, showing separately (a) for single men and (b) for a married man with two children, one aged under five and the other aged between five and 10, the following disbursements (i) unemployment benefit, (ii) supplementary benefit, (iii) income tax rebate, (iv) housing benefit and the following losses of revenue, (v) from income tax, (vi) from taxes on consumption of goods and services (vii) from employer's national insurance contributions and from employee's national insurance contributions.

Mr. Peter Rees [pursuant to his reply, 14 November 1984, c. 265]: Further assumptions are required in order to calculate the benefit entitlements of the individuals described. For the table it has been assumed that the men are entitled to full unemployment benefit, that the married man's wife does not work, that the man is a householder, that he is a council tenant in a property appropriate to his family size and that his housing benefit is calculated on the basis of estimated average rent and rates in the 1984-85 financial year. The figures assume equal length months of one twelfth of a year and are based on benefit rates applicable from 26 November 1984.

	Unemployment Benefit £	Supplementary Allowance £	Housing Benefits £
Single man	123·28	13·65	70·20
Married man with 2 children, one under 5 and one between 5 and 10	199·33	30·98	92·95

Changes in taxation for an individual depend further upon assumptions about when he becomes unemployed, the duration of his unemployment and his spending and saving behaviour when employed and unemployed. Any figures calculated in this way do not represent a net loss of revenue for the Exchequer as revenue flows may also change elsewhere in the economy, depending on assumptions about conditions elsewhere in the economy, were the level of unemployment different.

SOCIAL SERVICES

National Insurance Contributions

41. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the expected yield from national insurance contributions in the current year.

Mr. Newton: The income to the national insurance fund for the year 1984-85 from contributions is estimated by the Government Actuary in his report on the Social Security (Contributions) Re-Rating Order 1984 (Cmnd. 9386) as £19,021 million, after recovery by employers of statutory sick pay.

Computer Services (West Midlands)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much money has been spent by the West Midlands regional health authority for each year since 1979 to the latest available date on research and development of computer services; and how much money has been specifically offered by the Department to the West Midlands regional health authority to carry out a pilot study on the computerisation of hospital waiting lists.

Mr. John Patten: Information on expenditure on research and development of computer services by the West Midlands regional health authority is not collected centrally. My hon. Friend may wish to write to the regional health authority chairman, who may be able to let him have the required information.

The total cost of the pilot study on the computerisation of hospital waiting lists is estimated to be £10,000 capital and £85,000 revenue over three years. For 1984-85, £10,000 capital and £25,000 revenue funding has been approved by the Department to the West Midlands regional health authority. Subject to satisfactory progress, further payments will be approved for subsequent financial years. I understand that the regional health authority is now advertising for the appropriately qualified staff.

Day and Night Care Allowance (Tayside)

Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of people in Tayside in receipt of an allowance for day and night care.

Mr. Newton: I regret that this information is not available.

Benefit Claimants

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the approximate number of visits made to claimants' homes by his Department's staff in 1979 and 1983, respectively.

Mr. Whitney: The approximate number of effective visits made by the Department's staff to claimants in their homes was 3,752,000 in 1979 and 3,396,000 in 1983.

Maternity Allowance

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women received (a) maternity pay and (b) maternity allowance in 1982 and 1983.

Mr. Whitney: Maternity pay is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment who informs me that the figures for (a) are 118,128 and 125,239. In addition, payments were made to about 6,600 civil servants in each year. The figures for (b) are 333,200 and (up to 30 September 1983, the latest date to which figures are available) 243,500.

Burnley

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current work load of contributory and non-contributory benefit claims and payments at his Department's Burnley offices; and how this compares with one year ago.

Mr. Whitney: The number of incapacity benefit, retirement pension, widow's benefit and child benefit claims handled and the total number of payments made (excluding supplementary benefit payments) by the Burnley local office in October 1983 and October 1984 were as follows:

	October 1983	October 1984
Claims	1,876	1,319
Payments	9,787	16,049

The basis of these counts has changed since 1983 and the figures are not, therefore, directly comparable.

Benefits (Take-up)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if it is his policy positively to encourage take-up of means-tested and other social security benefits.

Mr. Newton: The Department's objective is to ensure that all those who might be entitled to benefit know what is available and we encourage take-up in a variety of ways. Leaflets and claim forms are distributed widely and the Department has developed the Freefone benefit advice service. This is in operation in all areas except for London postal districts which we hope to bring in next year.

The Department also channels information directly to potential beneficiaries. For example, about three months before attaining pension age everyone with a national insurance contribution record is sent an invitation to claim retirement pension; a leaflet inviting a claim to supplementary benefit is issued to all retirement pensioners, widows, sickness benefit claimants and unemployed claimants; one-parent benefit and family income supplement and advertised in every child benefit order book; and those claiming maternity benefit are invited to claim child benefit in due course.

Rate Rebates

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the amount of money given in rate rebates between 1978-79 and 1983-84 for each year, the component figures for standard and certificated rate rebates and the numbers receiving them for each year from 1978-79 to 1983-84.

Mr. Whitney: The amount given in rate rebates from 1978-79 to 1983-84 was as follows:

Year	*Standard rebates £ million	Certificated rebates† £ million	Total £ million	Numbers of beneficiaries Millions
1978-79	167	—	167	3·1
1979-80	201	—	201	3·1
1980-81	266	—	266	3·3
1981-82	374	—	374	3·7
1982-83	439	‡118	557	5·1
1983-84	540	718	1,258	6·7

Notes:

* For people not receiving supplementary benefit.

† For people not receiving supplementary benefit, from November 1982-April 1983. Prior to that, assistance with rates was included in supplementary benefit payments.

‡ For those local authority tenants who were covered by the partial start of housing benefit from November 1982. The full start was in April 1983.

Laundry Additions

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what criteria he uses in determining whether adequate facilities for the washing and drying of clothes exist in particular dwelling, when applications for laundry additions are refused.

Mr. Whitney: An addition to supplementary benefit can be awarded for laundry costs incurred where a claimant's home lacks "suitable washing or drying facilities". Decisions on claims for laundry additions are a matter for the independent adjudicating authorities who take account of the circumstances of each individual case. Guidance from the chief adjudication office on the interpretation of these provisions is contained in paragraph 4861(2) of the S manual, a copy of which is in the Library. I understand that the CAO is currently considering expanding his guidance on the interpretation of "suitable washing or drying facilities".

Severe Disablement Income

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimates he has made of the numbers of applicants in an average year who would have qualified for non-contributory invalidity pension but who will now not qualify for severe disablement allowance.

Mr. Newton: it is estimated that between 1,000 to 1,500 married women who have qualified annually for housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension will not qualify for severe disablement allowance. Overall, however, it is estimated that there will be a net increase in the number of married women newly qualifying for severe disablement allowance each year compared with the number who would have qualified for housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension.

Firm figures are not available of the number of men and single women who would have qualified annually for non-contributory invalidity pension but who will fail to qualify for severe disablement allowance but it is expected to be small.

High Rent Authorisation

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate how many housing benefit claimants will lose (a) up to £1 (b) £1 to £2 (c) £2 to £3, (d) £3 to £4, (e) £4 to £5 and (f) over £5 a week as a result of planned changes to high rent authorisations in April 1985.

Mr. Whitney: I refer my hon. Friend to my hon. Friend's reply to him on 29 October, at columns 843-44.

Expenditure

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, with reference to table 2.18 of the Government expenditure plans, 1984-85 to 1986-87, Cmnd. 9143-II, if he will give a breakdown of the major components of the figures for social security from 1978-79 to 1984-85.

Mr. Whitney: The information is as follows:

	1978-79	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85
Rent rebates	159	183	253	390	770	1621	1685
Rent allowances	36	37	44	58	66	463	378
Administration	23	28	34	38	56	79	73
Total	218	248	331	486	892	2,163	2,136

Note
The figures for 1982-83 reflect the partial start of the housing benefits scheme; those for 1983-84 show the first full year effect.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for what categories of claimants entitlement to single payments for furniture is subject to the condition that there is no suitable alternative furnished accommodation; and how they differ from the categories to whom the condition was applied by the Supplementary Benefits Commission prior to November 1980

Mr. Newton: Under current legislation, as under the policy of the Supplementary Benefits Commission, different conditions apply for people in existing accommodation and for those moving into unfurnished or partly furnished accommodation. The categories of people currently eligible for help when moving home—defined precisely in regulation 10(1)(a) of the Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) Regulations 1981 — are, broadly, as follows:

i. claimants whose move is necessary in that they satisfied the conditions, elsewhere in the regulations, for help with removal expenses (for example because of bereavement, divorce or marital breakdown or because the existing home is unhealthy, unsafe or overcrowded);

ii. claimants with a pensioner, child, pregnant woman or chronically sick or disabled person in the family;

iii. claimants with no immediate prospect of employment where they have (or the claimant's partner has) been receiving supplementary benefit continuously for six months;

iv. claimants who have just come out of prison, long-stay hospital or other institution.

Claimants in groups (iii) and (iv) only are also subject to the condition that there is no suitable alternative furnished accommodation available in the area. Under the SBC before 24 November 1980, payments for people moving home could be made, broadly, to people in groups (ii), (iii) and (iv) above — and also to those moving home because of bereavement, divorce or marital breakdown (but not the other categories included in group (i)) — without applying the condition of no suitable alternative furnished accommodation. Other claimants could receive help only if they were prevented by lack of essential items from moving out of accommodation which caused them serious hardship or risk to health, and provided that there was no suitable alternative furnished accommodation.

The current rules therefore apply the condition about alternative furnished accommodation to some fit, childless claimants below pension age to whom it did not apply under the SBC; on the other hand, the payments can now be made, without applying the alternative furnished accommodation condition, to a wider group of claimants whose move is necessary (as in group (i) above).

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will take steps to ensure that single payments for furniture, where a claimant is moving to unfurnished accommodation, are made before or as soon as possible after the move.

Mr. Whitney: Paragraph 7218 of the S manual (a copy of which is in the Library) already instructs local offices to make every effort to ensure that, prior to removal, a single payment is awarded for all items for which the need can be determined before the move. Local offices are aware of the need to identify such claims and to give them priority.

Mr. Cowans asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what respects the information about single payments for furniture in leaflet SB16 are inaccurate.

Mr. Newton: The leaflet gives a simple and comprehensible guide to the circumstances in which people on supplementary benefit are entitled to lump sum payments for special needs; it makes clear that it is not a full and authoritative statement of the law. We have recently revised the leaflet to improve its clarity and to take account of changes to the rules. The revised leaflet will be published on 26 November and copies will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Cowans asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he has taken to ensure that adjudication officers are aware of the rules governing entitlement to single payments for furniture, in view of the low level of knowledge revealed in a survey of supplementary benefit officers by Mr. Richard Berthoud of the Policy Studies Institute.

Mr. Newton: It is for the chief adjudication officer to issue guidance to adjudication officers about the supplementary benefit regulations, and we have no power to intervene. Guidance on the regulations governing entitlement to single payments for furniture is contained in chapter 7 (in particular at paragraphs 7171 to 7227) of the S manual, a copy of which is in the Library. Since the survey was carried out by the Policy Studies Institute further guidance has been issued this year by the chief adjudication officer in circulars S8/84 and S19/84, copies of which are in the Library. My hon. Friend is at present chairing a review—to which the Policy Studies Institute has presented evidence — which is considering the structure of the supplementary benefit scheme as a whole and ways in which the scheme might be administered more effectively.

NHS (Regional General Managers)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the National Health Service regional general managers have been appointed from within their own regions; and in how many cases their former posts are being kept open for them on an informal or formal basis in case their appointment is not renewed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Ten of the 12 regional general managers appointed so far come from within their own authority with pre-existing contracts. These contracts contain pre-existing rights which are retained during and beyond the period of the additional contract as general manager. They do not guarantee a return to the former post held if the general manager contract is not renewed.

Geriatric Care (South Tyneside)

Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what steps he is taking to reduce the waiting list for geriatric beds in south Tyneside;

(2) what mechanisms he has for monitoring and evaluating standards of care for elderly persons in south Tyneside.

Mr. John Patten: South Tyneside health authority is responsible for the provision of health services in its area, and I understand that it is currently considering what changes it should be making in services for the elderly. Its plans, when endorsed by the regional health authority, will form the basis for monitoring performance and achievements in the review process. If the hon. Member wants any further information, he may care to contact the chairman of the health authority.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will make a statement on progress being made on take-up of housing benefit supplement by those eligible to receive it;

(2) whether he is satisfied with the role being played by local authorities in encouraging take-up of housing benefit supplement; and if there are any plans to change or revise that role.

Mr. Whitney: The Department has provided a formula to assist local authorities in the identification of pensioners who might qualify for housing benefit supplement or supplementary benefit; and work is continuing to find a suitable formula to cover non-pensioners. The administration of the housing benefits scheme is the responsibility of individual local authorities who must decide what degree of priority to attach to this area of work. There are no plans to make changes in advance of the report of the independent housing benefit review, which is due by the end of this year.

Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the present practices with regard to back-dating of claims for housing benefit supplement; to when they are back-dated; and if there are any plans to change these practices.

Mr. Whitney: Where a claim for standard housing benefit is made within one month of the notification that a claim for supplementary benefit has been unsuccessful entitlement to housing benefit supplement will be backdated to the date of the supplementary benefit claim. Where an unsuccessful claim for supplementary benefit falls within one month of the notification of entitlement to standard housing benefit, housing benefit supplement will be backdated to the date of the claim for standard housing benefit. Where a person can show that there was good cause for his failure to claim supplementary benefit earlier housing benefit supplement may be backdated and paid for a period before the claim was received.

There are no plans to change these arrangements.

Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to announce the findings of the review of the housing benefit scheme.

Mr. Whitney: The review team has been asked to report by the end of the year. It is expected that the Government's conclusions will be published in the early part of 1985.

Single-parent Families (Income)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish figures, using November 1984 benefit rates, and tabulating net weekly spending power for a lone mother with two children aged six and eight years living in local authority accommodation and paying average local authority rent and rates, in each of the following circumstances (a) not in paid work, drawing long-term supplementary benefit, (b) working part-time earning £24 a week and drawing long-term supplementary benefit and (c) working full-time with £25 weekly work expenses and earning the average for female manual earners, and also three-quarters and one-and-a-half times average for female manual earners.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is given in the following table:

November 1984

Lone mother with two children aged six and eight years	Net weekly spending power £
(a) In receipt of long-term supplementary benefit	60·10
(b) Working part-time and earning £24 net a week and in receipt of long-term supplementary benefit	72·10
(c) Working full-time with £25 weekly work expenses earning:
(i) Average for female manual earners;	64·24
(ii) Three-quarters average for female manual earners	65·92
(iii) One-and-a-half times average for female manual earners	82·09

Notes:

(1) Average gross earnings for female manual earners are assumed to be £96·92 a week;

(2) The general assumptions in the April 1984 DHSS tax-benefit model tables apply except that rent is assumed to be £15·60 a week and general rates £5·85 a week.

Joint Finance Expenditure

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services to what extent the disregard from grant penalties has assisted in the management of joint finance expenditure.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The disregard from grant penalties was first announced in December 1983 and effective in April 1984. It relieves authorities of grant holdback penalties they may otherwise incur in respect of increases in spending on projects to which health authorities are contributing under the joint finance arrangements. It provides further encouragement to authorities to continue their participation in jointly financed projects. We expect uptake of joint finance to continue at a high level.

Community Care

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information is available in his Department as to the extent of the transfer of funds with patients on transfer from hospital to community care by the health service throughout England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: I can answer only in relation to England. Thirteen projects have so far been selected for central support as part of the care in the community pilot projects programme, involving some 500 patients. A further batch of projects will be selected in the new year. We have now received in all some 230 applications and we understand some of these projects may go ahead with local funding.

The position in Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what other departments of Her Majesty's Government have provided assistance and support in implementing the Government's community care policies.

Mr. John Patten: People being cared for in the community receive assistance and support from the programmes of many other Government Departments either directly or through local authorities or other local bodies. The fields concerned include housing (Department of the Environment) fare concessions and other forms of assistance with transport (Department of Transport), further education and recreation facilities (Department of Education and Science) sheltered employment and support projects involving unemployed people (Department of Employment and Manpower Services Commission) and support for voluntary organisations (Home Office). In addition, certain relevant tax concessions are available from the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services to what extent Government policies on manpower limitations by local authorities have affected care in the community initiatives.

Mr. John Patten: Local authorities have been advised, in agreement with the local authority associations, that Government policy on manpower should not be an obstacle to the transfer of resources to community care since staff whose employment is financed by NHS funds do not add to the rate burden.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department has sought the views of the Association of County Councils on the recent trend by health authorities to establish their own community-based services, such as community units for the mentally-handicapped.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. and learned Friend has recently received a letter on this topic from the chairman of the social services committee of the Association of County Councils. He hopes to reply shortly. We will send copies of the correspondence to my hon. Friend.

Hospital Returns

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what changes were made in the compilation or validation of annual hospital returns in 1979 prior to or as part of the central computerisation of the returns.

Mr. John Patten: The main changes made to the compilation of the annual hospital statistical return (Form SH3) in 1979 were as follows:

i. separate figures relating to private patients in NHS hospitals were removed from this return and collected separately on Form SBH211.

ii. separate figures on the numbers of healthy persons lodged at hospitals were no longer collected.

iii. figures on individual specialist units (eg burns units, spinal injuries units) were recorded separately. Previously figures on some of these units were recorded under recognised main specialties and others were aggregated centrally under one category.

Details of these changes were given in health notices HN(79)19 and HN(79)99, copies of which are available in the Library.

The validation process remained unchanged in 1979, but the computer was used where possible to perform validation checks previously carried out manually.

Written Answers to Questions

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Port Stanley Hospital

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about progress on the new Port Stanley hospital.

Mr. Raison: The architect responsible for the outline design of the new hospital has recently held detailed discussions about his proposals with all interested parties in Port Stanley. I expect to receive his final report and recommendations shortly. We shall then, in consultation with the Falkland Islands Government, proceed with arrangements for the new development as quickly as possible.

Ethiopia

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied that United Kingdom food aid to famine-stricken areas in Ethiopia has reached the areas in Ethiopia and Tigre not under the control of the Ethiopia Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Raison: The United Kingdom's food aid to Ethiopia has been sent both direct to the Ethiopian Government's Relief and Rehabilitation Commission and to voluntary agencies working in all the areas affected by drought, including Eritrea and Tigre.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Shops Act 1950

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the report of the committee of inquiry into proposals to amend the Shops Act; and what proposals he has to amend the Shops Act 1950.

Mr. Fox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the report of the committee of inquiry into proposals to amend the Shops Act 1950.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to publish the report next week. He will need to study the Committee's recommendations and reactions to the report before reaching any decisions on future legislation.

Passports

Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out the cost of re-issuing (a) an individual passport and (b) all passports on expiry in the most recent year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I understand my hon. Friend's question to relate to issue of new documents to persons who have previously held passports. No records are maintained showing the number of these transactions. Various factors will, in any case, affect the time and cost involved in providing individual passport services at home and overseas which would make calculation of their costs extremely difficult and inevitably imprecise.

Mr. Edward Hopson

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how (a) the consultant psychiatrist and (b) the probation officer exercised their supervision of Mr. Edward Hopson, following his conditional discharge from Broadmoor in April 1982; how often he was seen by each; how many reports his Department received from each; on what dates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: I understand from the supervising consultant psychiatrist that he saw Mr. Hopson at Broadmoor on seven occasions after his conditional discharge. He carried out his supervision by means of these consultations and by regular contact with the supervising probation officers. My right hon. and learned Friend received seven reports from him in April, August and November 1982, in February, August and December 1983 and in June 1984.

I understand from the Chief Probation Officer of Middlesex that the probation officers responsible for Mr. Hopson's supervision maintained regular contact with him, on an average of once every two weeks, by interviews with him at their offices or at his home. Until March 1983, Mr. Hopson was living at a hostel and in daily contact with experienced hostel staff. Reports were received from supervising probation officers by my right hon. and learned Friend in June, August and November 1982, in February, March, July and November 1983, and in March and September 1984.

Picket Line Arrests

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department from what services the 11 persons described as service men in the answer of 12 November about arrests on picket line duty, Official Report, column 70, came.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Ten were members of local authority fire brigades, and one was a naval rating. All were off duty when the arrests were made.

ENERGY

Farms (Overhead Power Cables)

Viscount Cranborne asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether, in view of the increasing height of agricultural machinery and equipment, he is satisfied with the present regulations about overhead power cables around farms and farmbuildings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I am satisfied that the statutory clearances from the ground of overhead electricity lines are generally appropriate. The safe use of farm machinery in the vicinity of such lines is kept under review by the National Farmers Union and the electricity supply industry, and also by the Health and Safety Executive and my own engineering inspectorate, both of which statutorily receive reports of accidents. It is generally agreed that the most effective and efficient way of reducing the very small number of farming accidents due to contact with electricity lines is by encouraging safe working methods. Much publicity and other help are available to that end.

Conservation

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the specific projects concerned with energy conservation which are supported by his Department.

Mr. David Hunt: The information is as follows:

Lamsac Project: Design and implementation of energy management systems for local authorities.

Voluntary organisations community insulation projects scheme.

Heat scheme.

"Energy matters" home energy audit scheme.

Energy efficiency demonstration scheme.

Monitoring and target-setting scheme.

Energy management groups.

National energy management advisory committee.

National energy management conference and exhibition.

The coal firing scheme.

Training courses and workshops.

Research and development programmes (domestic, non-domestic and industrial).

Combined heat and power and district heating lead city studies.

WALES

Pig Industry

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the present state of the pig industry in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: In Wales the pig breeding herd has continued to decline, the provisional census figures for June 1984 show a fall of 18 per cent. in the breeding herd since June 1983 and now stands at around 14,300 head. However, there are indications that the situation is changing with a slight increase in the size of breeding herd anticipated.

Dairy Farming

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy towards those dairy farmers who have applied under the outgoers scheme but have been rejected; and whether they will be given time to apply for special case consideration.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No dairy producers who have made valid applications within the terms of the outgoers scheme have yet been rejected. Besides those currently being invited to join the scheme under the first tranche of offers, a further second tranche of offers has now been made to other producers in a higher production band to include those with quotas of up to 250,000 litres. All those who have applied to be outgoers have, like all other milk producers, been able to apply at the same time for special case consideration and many have done so.

Education Authorities

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the amount of extra cash allocated to Welsh local education authorities consequent upon the autumn statement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Stradling Thomas: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not yet decided on the allocation of his resources to particular services, including education, for 1985-86. His decisions will be made known in due course.

Water Rates

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the cash rise in Welsh water rates consequent upon the autumn statement of 12 November; what is the total cash sum involved; by what percentage water rates may rise; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Welsh water authority has yet to finalise its budget for 1985-86. This will take account not only of the changes in external financing limits included in the Chancellor's autumn statement, but of performance aims yet to be agreed and the financial target still to be set for the authority for 1985-86. While discussions with the authority on these matters will be continuing, I expect the increase in main charges to be above the rate of inflation.

Food Surpluses

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the Welsh locations used for the storage of European Economic Community food surpluses.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 30 September 1984 stocks of surplus European Economic Community food were located as follows:

Skimmed Milk Powder: Ammanford, Cwmbran, Narbeth, Barry, St. Clears, Swansea (2), Llandyssul (2), Caerphilly, Pembroke, Tregaron, Eglwyswrw, Overton, Hawarden

Butter: Cardiff(2), Newport, Rhyl, Swansea

Beef: Cardiff, Rhyl

Note: Numbers in brackets after place names indicate where there is more than one store in a location.

Housing Improvement Grants

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many housing improvement grants he expects to be paid in Wales and Mid-Glamorgan, respectively during 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Latest returns indicate that £81 million will be spent on renovation grants in Wales in 1984-85 of which mid-Glamorgan local authorities will spend £22 million. The amount spent in 1985-86 will be a matter for local authorities to decide in the light of their priorities and the resources available.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the total number of applicants waiting for housing improvement grants in Mid-Glamorgan at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: At 30 June 1984, the number of applications for housing renovation grants awaiting approval was approximately 21,000.

Factory Employees

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of employees currently working in factories constructed by the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have asked the Welsh Development Agency to provide the information requested to the hon. Gentleman.

Health Authorities (Ancillary Services)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales which health authorities in Wales have indicated their intention not to put out to tender ancillary services.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: None.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales which catering and laundry companies have declined to tender for appropriate services despite (a) receiving an invitation or (b) seeking information on the proposed tender within the National Health Service in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Four companies have declined to tender. It would not be appropriate to disclose their names.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Coal Industry Dispute

Mr. Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he or his officials have had with the British Steel Corporation regarding the seeking of injunctions by the corporation against secondary picketing of its installations in the current miners' dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Secretary of State and I have naturally been kept in close touch by the chairman of the British Steel Corporation with issues arising from the miners' dispute. The Government have made it clear that they would not wish to discourage any employer from using the legal rememdies which are now available as a result of the employment legislation. Action under these provisions must, however, be a matter for the judgment of the particular management concerned.

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has about categories of manufactured goods which were made in the United Kingdom in 1972 and which are no longer manufactured in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fletcher: Techological change and trends in fashion ensure that there is a constant stream of products becoming outmoded, outdated or unprofitable, but there is no central register which would provide a list of these. The same forces ensure the development of new products based upon the exploitation of new materials, and techniques and this has led over recent years to the introduction of such items as fibre-optic cables, home micro-computers, video cassettes and recorders, and many more.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements the Government are making to help secure consistency when responsibility for trading standards and related functions is devolved to the districts, as indicated in paragraph 2.13.1 of the paper placed in the Library by the Secretary of State for the Environment on 31 July.

Mr. Fletcher: The White Paper "Streamlining the Cities" (Cmnd. 9063) proposed that, on abolition of the metropolitan county councils, responsibility for trading standards and related functions should be devolved to the district councils, but stressed the importance of consistent standards of enforcement across each metropolitan county. This point was emphasised in responses to consultation.

In the more detailed document on transfer of functions published in July, the Government said that they were considering what measures might be appropriate to help secure such consistent standards of enforcement. They have now decided to include in the Local Government Bill a provision requiring the district councils in each metropolitan county to set up a committee whose function it will be to seek to co-ordinate enforcement and the use of specialist staff and facilities employed on enforcement work.

My right hon. Friend hopes that these committees will be instrumental in:

a. ensuring that all district councils within their area adopt common levels of enforcement activity, and common interpretation of statutes for both advice and prosecution work;

b. maintaining or developing physical facilities (such as testing stations and laboratory services) for trading standards activities on a shared basis for the district councils within their area;

c. establishing a co-ordinated approach to the staffing of the service within their area.

Mr. Ian MacGregor

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the review committee responsible for assessing the performance payments due to Lazard Frères of New York in respect of Mr. Ian MacGregor's chairmanship of the British Steel Corporation has reached a decision on the first performance payment.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Government and Lazard Frères of New York have agreed to defer any decision on the first performance payment. The review committee has therefore been asked to defer its decision on the first payment until the same time as its decision on the second payment, which is due to be made next year, after BSC's results to end-March 1985 are known.

EMPLOYMENT

Information Technology Centre, Welwyn Hatfield

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Employment what consideration will be given to the provision of an information technology centre for Welwyn Hatfield district.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government have agreed the setting up of a total of 175 information technology centres funded jointly by the Manpower Services Commission and the Department of Trade and Industry over the period 1981 to 1985. Sites have been found for all 175 centres in the programme and no further applications can therefore be considered.

SCOTLAND

Labour Statistics

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list, by postal code district, the latest unemployment figures within the Dunfermline and Kirkcaldy travel-to-work areas; and if he will show for each postal code district the change in unemployment over the preceding 12-month period.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Information by post-code sector is not available for the recently redefined travel-to-work areas of Dunfermline and Kirkcaldy. The following table shows the number of unemployed claimants by post-code sector for each of the jobcentre areas which formerly comprised the travel-to-work areas of Dunfermline and Kirkcaldy at 11 October 1984, the latest date for which information is available, and the change they represent compared with the figures at the corresponding date last year.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Butter Exports

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he will take to overcome the problems of exporting United Kingdom butter to West Germany.

Mrs. Fenner: The basic problem is that the Federal Republic of Germany requires official veterinary certification on matters outside the knowledge of our state veterinary service. We are pressing the German authorities to adopt a different approach.

Potatoes

Mr. William Powell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tonnes, at what public cost and for what reason, of potatoes have been spoilt with dye to make them unfit for human consumption in 1984 and in each of the preceding four years.

Mr. MacGregor: The Agriculture Act 1957 empowers the Government to provide potato producers in the United Kingdom with guaranteed prices or assured markets.

No separate payments are made to the Potato Marketing Board for potatoes disposed of for stockfeed. The quantities of potatoes so disposed of as part of the guarantee arrangements during the crop years 1980-84, and the total public expenditure cost of market support, are as follows:

Crop Year	'000 tonnes	£ million
1980	496	15·7
1981	—	—
1982	224	*8·0
1983	—	—
1984	†10	—

* Including loans of £5·9 million.
† To 9 November 1984.

Agriculture Council

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Agriculture Council meeting held in Brussels on 12 and 13 November.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 14 November 1984, c. 295]: I am now in a position to make a further statement about the collection of milk supplementary levy. I understand that the Commission has now decided to extend by 10 days the time allowed for the first levy payment, so that it would have more time to consider what to do. In the meantime, the intervention board will not be calling for the payment of levy. I understand that the Milk

Marketing Board for Northern Ireland will be making its November payments to producers without any levy deductions.

DEFENCE

Trident

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimated total cost of the Trident project.

Mr. Butler: I have nothing to add to the answer which my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Members for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) and Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) on 13 November, at c. 520-21.

PRIME MINISTER

International Youth Year

Mr. Alton asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement outlining Government proposals for International Youth Year.

The Prime Minister: The Government are directly supporting International Youth Year by grant aiding the co-ordinating committees in the United Kingdom. Many other activities in Government programmes have relevance to the objectives of the year, including existing grants in connection with youth participation, and support of a visit of 250 young people from 22 Europen countries.

NATIONAL FINANCE

EC Finance Council

Mr. Fallon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the meeting of the European Community Finance Council in Brussels on 12 November.

Mr. Lawson: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement made by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) on 14 November at c. 350. I have placed copies of the Council's common position on the measures necessary to guarantee the effective application of budgetary discipline in the Library of the House.

Book Seizures

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what information he has as to which of the books seized from Gay's the Word bookshop and kept by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise are obtainable in other bookshops and public libraries;

(2) how many of the books seized from Gay's the Word bookshop and kept by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise have been the subject of prosecutions under the Obscene Publications Act;

(3) how many officers of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise were involved in the raids connected with Gay's the Word bookshop; and how many have been involved in reading the books;

(4) if he will list the books seized from the Gay's the Word bookshop; the numbers of copies of each book, together with the list of books returned; and the number of copies.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Hard Riding Hats

Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated value added tax yield on British Standard Institute approved standard of hard riding hats in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Wales (Gross National Product)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present rate of growth of the gross national product of Wales; and how this compares with the figure for the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Peter Rees: The latest available estimates of gross domestic product at current prices for Wales and comparative figures for the United Kingdom are:

£ million

	Wales	United Kingdom
1978	6,242	146,962
1979	7,115	170,174
1980	8,085	198,440
1981	8,580	214,793
1982	9,131	232,503

Regional estimates are made in current prices only. Care should therefore be taken in comparing the derived growth rates from the above figures, because they include the effect both of price rises and of changes in real output.

Hotels

Mr. Freeson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what activities of hotels are categorised as non-trading for tax purposes;

(2) what activities of guest houses are categorised as non-trading for tax purposes;

(3) what activities of boarding houses are categorised as non-trading for tax purposes.

Mr. Lawson [pursuant to the reply, 15 November 1984, c. 351]: None as such. I can assure the right hon. Member that hotels, boarding houses and guest houses within the generally understood meaning of these terms are likely to be trading. But it is the nature of the activity and not the description of the establishment that determines the tax treatment.

Funding

Mr. Gould asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the extent of over-funding or under-funding for each quarter since the beginning of 1982; what have been the total sales of commercial bills for each quarter over the same period; and what has been the sterling index, the level of industrial production and the level of real wages for each quarter over the same period.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 12 November 1984, c. 90]: Under and over funding can be defined in a number of different ways. Quarterly data on the PSBR and purchases of public sector debt by the United Kingdom private sector (other than banks) and the external finance of the public sector are in table 11.3 of the September Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin.

Data for total sales of commercial bills are not available. Table 5 of the September 1984 Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin provides the closest approximation; it shows acceptances, mainly of commercial bills, granted by the banks to United Kingdom residents at mid quarter dates. Net transactions in commercial bills by the issue department are shown for calendar quarters in table 1.6 of the October edition of "Financial Statistics".

Quarterly data for the sterling index are in the table on page 50 of Economic Trends, and data on the level of industrial production are in Economic Trends page 26.

There is more than one definition of real wages. Economic Trends page 40 shows quarterly data on wage rates and earnings. Quarterly data on retail prices are given on page 42 of the same publication.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

School Closures

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out in the Official Report a précis of his reasons for rejecting proposals put forward by local education authorities to close and amalgamate secondary schools pursuant to the Education Act 1980.

Mr. Dunn: In the limited number of cases where my right hon. Friend or his predecessor have rejected proposals made by local education authorities pursuant to the Education Act to close or amalgamate secondary schools it was only after most careful consideration of all the relevant financial, educational and other factors. As I explained to the right hon. Member in reply to his earlier question on 12 November 1984 at column 62, among the reasons for rejection were that the proposals were not in their view in accord with their policies set out in circulars 2/80, 2/81 and 4/82, copies of which I am sending to the right hon. Member. Proposals that have been rejected have failed to take account of the general policies of my right hon. Friend and his predecessor on the curriculum and examinations, and sustaining a balance between the county and voluntary sectors, appropriate to each area, or of their particular policies of not normally approving proposals that would lead to closure or significant change of character of schools with sixth forms of proven worth; or of the need to pay particular regard to parental preference on religious or other grounds for maintaining opportunities for single sex education. Most of the proposals listed in my previous answer were rejected for one or more of these reasons and, according to the circumstances of the case, decisions may also have been influenced by factors such as the inadequacy of consultation or the extent to which amalgamated schools would have been housed in split site premises that were judged unacceptable because of particular educational and organisational difficulties that would have arisen.

Students (Parental Contribution)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what slice of gross residual income will be required to cover the parental contribution in 1985 for parents with combined gross residual incomes of £26,000, £25,000, £24,000, £23,000, £22,000, £21,000, £20,000, £19,000, £18,000, £17,000, £16,000, £15,000, £14,000, £13,000, £12,000, £11,000 and £10,000, allowing for a normal pattern of taxation and national insurance payments for parents taxed jointly with none, one, two or three additional dependent children.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply which my right hon. Friend gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on 14 November 1984 at columns 238-39. The Department does not collect information on the tax and national insurance payments of the parents of mandatory award holders. The assessed parental contributions in 1985-86 for families with no other dependent children will be as follows:

Residual Income £	Assessed Parental Contribution £	Per cent.
10,000	291	2·9
11,000	474	4·3
12,000	674	5·6
13,000	874	6·7
14,000	1,074	7·7
15,000	1,274	8·5
16,000	1,524	9·5
17,000	1,774	10·4
18,000	2,024	11·2
19,000	2,274	12·0
20,000	2,524	12·6
21,000	2,774	13·2
22,000	3,024	13·7
23,000	3,274	14·2
24,000	3,524	14·7
25,000	3,774	15·1
26,000	4,000	15·4

The contribution payable in each case may be less than the amounts shown in the scale, particularly at its top end. This will depend on the amount of the award (maintenance and fees) towards which the contribution has to be made and whether any of the assessed contribution is offset by allowances for other dependent children.

Decisions have not yet been taken on the level of deductions from parental contributions in 1985-86 in respect of other dependent children in the family.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Reform

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the Government's proposals for the administration and servicing of the outstanding debt of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils if those councils are abolished.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: We have taken account of representations received on our White Paper "Streamlining the Cities" (Cmnd. 9063), and our present proposals differ in several respects.

We said in the White Paper that it is not possible to construct an equitable basis for distributing the external debt of the authorities to be abolished between successor bodies and that administration of the external debt would therefore need to remain the responsibility of a single administering body in each area. There may be some exceptions to that, for which we shall make provision if appropriate, but for the most part we hold to that view. The proposal in the White Paper was that that single body should be a lead district in each metropolitan area but a specially constituted residuary body in Greater London. We have subsequently announced that we intend to establish residuary bodies for each area, though outside London it will still be possible for a lead district to take on the debt function from the outset if all the authorities concerned agree.

The White paper said that the guiding principle for servicing the debt would be that responsibility for making sufficient payments to the body administering the debt should be transferred with the asset to which the debt relates. This was the principle followed in the reorganisation carried out under the Local Government Act 1972. On further reflection, however, we believe that it would be very complicated to make such arrangemens in the present case, since there is no single body which is the main successor to each of the outgoing authorities.

We therefore now propose a different approach, which we believe will be as equitable as an asset-based attribution could be whilst being considerably simpler to arrange. The system would be as follows.

Debt servicing arrangements for assets already transferred, notably former GLC housing, would continue unchanged and would also be applied to analogous transfers made at the time of abolition.

All remaining external debt managed by the administering body would be viewed as a single sum, for which a repayment period would be calculated equal to the average of the repayment periods of all the individual amounts of debt constituting the sum. Responsibility for servicing various tranches of this sum would be attributed in three ways.

First, tranches would be earmarked as being associated with the loans, including house purchase advances, made by the authority being abolished. Bodies inheriting the outgoing authority's rights and liabilities in relation to such loans — including in appropriate cases the debt administering body itself—would be required to service an amount of debt equal to the amount outstanding at the time of abolition on the loans transferred to it.

Second, a tranche would be attributed where appropriate to the new single service authorities which are to be established on abolition. This would in each case reflect the amount of debt outstanding against the service in question at 31 March 1983, the end of the financial year immediately prior to the announcement of the Government's intention to abolish the authorities concerned, adjusted to take account of repayments and of new borrowing for capital expenditure on that service from that date to the date of abolition.

Third, responsibility for servicing the residue of the sum would be attributed to the boroughs or districts in each area pro-rata to the population at a specified date as close as possible to the date of abolition.

The foregoing arrangements are concerned with external debt. In some of the authorities to be abolished there will also be debt to internal capital funds. The White Paper proposed that such debt would be extinguished at abolition. This is still our proposal. There is no corresponding external debt, and therefore no need for the successor authorities to make contributions to the debt administering body on account of such debt.

We are very conscious of the importance of securing the interests of lenders. Under existing arrangements, all loan debt is an equal charge on the revenues of the borrowing authority. This situation will be preserved after abolition. We propose that the external debt shall be a charge on the revenues of the body administering it, while the bodies responsible for servicing the debt will be treated for the purposes of the charge on their revenues as if they had borrowed the sums involved from the administering body. In this way I believe that lenders may have confidence that their interests will be unaffected.

I shall be writing today to the local authority associations inviting them to comment on these proposals before final decisions are taken.

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements are proposed to maintain the existing Greater London council and metropolitan county council central data bases after the abolition of those councils.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The GLC and metropolitan county councils have provided focal points for the collection and assembly of data on a wide range of topics which have been drawn on by various other bodies. It is envisaged that the borough and metropolitan district councils will need to continue to collect, and have access to, at least some of this information on a consistent London or country-wide basis to support the proper exercise of their enhanced functions.

To facilitate this we intend that the Local Government Bill should provide new powers for each borough or district council to assist in the collection of information on matters concerning part or the whole of the metropolitan area. In addition, where a two thirds majority of the borough or district councils in an area decide that specific information needs to be collected, each council will have a duty to collect the information and to provide it to any other borough or district or appropriate Minister on request. Finally, if any council fails to co-operate in the collection of this information there will be powers for another borough or district, subject to the agreement of the two thirds majority, to collect the information and to recover the costs from the defaulting authority.

These measures will ensure that the successor authorities are able to co-operate to maintain the London or county-wide coverage of those existing GLC and MCC data bases which they consider necessary. This will be particularly important in the field of highways and traffic management, where the Department of Transport has similar data needs, as well as land-use planning. In London it is envisaged that the London Planning Commission will also have a useful role to play in the collection and analysis of information on matters affecting London as a whole.

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements will be made to ensure continued running of services provided by the Greater London council and metropolitan county councils under general powers in the event of abolition.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Local Government Bill will provide for the transfer of specific statutory functions of the GLC and MCCs to the borough and district councils, or to other bodies. It will not, however, deal with general powers which are available, under existing legislation, to both county and district councils, or to both the GLC and the London borough councils.

Both the White Paper (Cmnd. 9063) and the more detailed paper about our proposals which we published in July referred to a number of activities of the GLC/MCCs under each power. We indicated that it would be for the successor bodies to decide how best to obtain these services for themselves. However, we suggested that they might consider joint arrangements where these would be efficient in the use of specialist staff and facilities. We have also said that there might be a role for the residuary bodies in maintaining some services of this kind for their own use and, on a repayment basis, as a service to others.

In the course of consultations on our proposals a number of these services have been suggested as suitable for retention as units, including central purchasing, scientific services, including county analysts' laboratories, general purpose computing and information facilities and systems, derelict land reclamation teams, and the GLC's specialist housing repair and improvement teams.

We remain convinced that decisions on the future of these services should properly be taken by the borough/district councils, and where appropriate other successor bodies. The Department of the Environment will, however, be prepared to use its good offices in considering how best worthwhile work of this kind might be maintained if there is a demand for this from the successor bodies. If permanent arrangements cannot be made in good time we envisage that the residuary bodies could maintain the existing services for a transitional period. In any event we expect that the ownership and operation of general-purpose computers will initially need to be transferred to the residuary bodies.

It will, of course, be essential, if the Department is to be able to help in this way, that the GLC/MCCs should authorise the officers responsible for these services to provide information to, and to enter into discussion with, the Department.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will outline the parameters of the proposed study of the local government system of finance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) on 26 October 1984 at column 747.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many changes there have been to the grant structure of local government finance since 1959.

Mr. Waldegrave: There have been two major changes since 1959. The first was made in the Local Government Act 1966, which was amended by the Local Government Act 1974 to take account of the re-organisation of local government in that year. The second was made in the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980.

Brent Council

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment in what way he has been told by Brent borough council that it is its intention to tailor its expenditure to live within the limits he has set; and what information he has as to how the council took such a decision.

Mr. Waldegrave: I was informed by the leader of Brent council in a letter dated 13 August 1984 that it was the intention of the Conservative minority administration to keep within the expenditure limit which I have set for 1985-86.

I have no further information.

Housing Subsidy

Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to issue to the local authority associations consultation papers on housing subsidy for 1985-86.

Mr. Gow: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and Secretary of State for Wales have issued consultation papers today. The first concerns the Government's proposals for calculating the increase which local authorities will be expected to find from local sources in arriving at their entitlement to housing subsidy for 1985-86. The second concerns the amount of management and maintenance expenditure to be treated as reckonable for housing subsidy purposes in 1985-86. Copies of the papers have been placed in the Vote Office and in the Libraries of both Houses.

Carsington (Embankment Dam)

Mr. Parris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received the report of the investigation which he set up into the failure during the construction of the embankment dam at Carsington; and what action he proposes to take.

Mr. Gow: I have placed in the Library copies of a first report by Mr. R. E. Coxon, BSc, DIC, FICE, on the failure of the Carsington embankment.

Mr. Coxon's interim conclusions include the following:

The dam failed on the upstream slope before reservoir impounding began. If it had occurred on first filling the water level would have been substantially below the crest at the time and breaching of the bank would have been very improbable.

The investigation work on the slide has been both extensive and thorough, carefully and diligently pursued.

Testing of materials has been properly performed and monitored; some further testing of samples remains to be completed.

The work has provided a sound basis for judgements to be made on the cause and should prove adequate when fully analysed to establish the data on which remedial works can be safely based.

Appropriate measures have been taken throughout to safeguard personnel and works, and to leave the site in a secure state for the winter season.

The design of remedial works will have to include a number of factors not discussed in detail in this report. These include economics, the effects of proximate ancillary structures and the need to modify or relocate them, the provision for treatment of the foundations in relation to the remedial works proposed, and the geochemical properties of the embankment, foundation and reservoir and their effect on design and water quality.

I shall study carefully these and Mr. Coxon's other conclusions. Meanwhile I have the assurance of the chairman of the Severn-Trent water authority that he will consult me before any reconstruction measures are put in hand.

Mr. Coxon expects to present his final report in the Spring of 1985.

Performing Arts

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further consideration he has given to the grant-related expenditure methodologies for the arts; what further consideration he intends to give; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have been asked to reply on behalf of the Minister for the Arts.

Grant-related expenditure methodologies generally are kept under regular review as part of the preparations for the annual rate support grant settlements. Detailed studies of the GRE methodology for the library service are continuing, and it is proposed similarly to examine the museum service GRE shortly. There is no separate GRE for other arts expenditure at present. As regards the possibility of developments in that respect, I refer the hon. Member to the reply sent by my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for the Arts to the Chairman of the Education Science and Arts Select Committee on 31 July last.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Unemployed Persons (Benefits)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average amount of total benefit paid to unemployed persons with a spouse and (a) two children, (b) four children and (c) five children and over.

Mr. Whitney: Information in the form requested is not available. However, the table gives the standard rates of unemployment benefit plus child benefit at the rate of £6·50 per child (£6·85 from November 1984) and equivalent supplementary benefit rates for those whose resources are not otherwise sufficient.

	Unemployment benefit plus child benefit		Supplementary benefit including child benefit
	November 1983	November 1984	November 1983	November 1984
	£	£	£	£
Couple plus 2 children (1 over 11, 1 under 11)	57·05	59·70	66·35	69·50
Couple plus 4 children (2 over 11, 2 under 11)	70·35	73·40	89·20	93·45
Couple plus 5 children (2 over 11, 3 under 11)	77·00	80·25	98·35	103·05

For a family with more than five children, unemployment benefit currently increases by 15p per child, but the child dependency addition will be abolished from 26 November 1984. For supplementary benefit, the rates increase by £9·60 (from 26 November) for each child under 11 and £13·70 or £14·35 respectively for each child aged 11 to 15.

Housing benefit may also be payable to assist with rent and rates: supplementary benefit recipients would generally have these housing costs met in full; for other claimants the amount of help would depend on the level of their rent and rates, the size and composition of the household and the amount of other income.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Neale asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to make changes in the housing benefit scheme.

Mr. Newton: After the changes announced earlier in the year—including the high rent scheme changes—the Government do not intend to make any changes of substance in the housing benefit scheme pending the outcome of the independent review of the scheme.

The November changes include a special increase of 50p in the child's needs allowance which, with the normal up-rating increase, will raise it from £11·95 to £12·85 and make it a higher proportion of a married couple's basic needs allowance than ever before; but we will not be proceeding in advance of the review with the further increase of £1 previously proposed for April 1985.

We are, however, proposing to close an unintended loophole in the Housing Benefit Regulations which allows a grown-up son or daughter living at home to receive a rent allowance for the rent element of any board and lodging payment made to his or her parents. People living in their family's household have never been regarded as having any liability for rent or rates in their own right; and neither housing benefit nor the earlier rent allowance scheme were intended to give help with payments made by non-dependents for their keep. We are consulting the local authority associations and the Social Security Advisory Committee about amending regulations my right hon. Friend intends to lay before the House in the near future to remedy this defect.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) in what circumstances housing benefit supplement can be backdated to 1 April 1983;

(2) if he has any information on the backlog at local authorities and offices of his Department of unidentified housing benefit supplement cases.

Mr. Newton: Housing benefit supplement is a special payment of supplementary benefit and in order to qualify for it a person must first claim supplementary benefit. If a person fails to qualify for supplementary benefit because his income exceeds his supplementary benefit requirements the local DHSS Office automatically notifies the local authority of the amount in excess. The local authority then pay housing benefit supplement to meet the difference between the excess income and the amount of rent and rates not met by normal housing benefit.

I am not aware of any backlog of claims awaiting action by either local authorities or local offices.

Housing benefit supplement will only be backdated to 1 April 1983 if the claimant can show that he had good cause for his failure to make an earlier claim for supplementary benefit.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated take-up of housing benefit supplement.

Mr. Newton: Information on the take-up of housing benefit supplement is not available.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are estimated to be eligible for housing benefit supplement.

Mr. Newton: The Department estimated in 1983 that about 460,000 claimants then receiving rent rebate and allowance and rate rebate or supplementary benefit would be eligible for housing benefit supplement.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list his powers and responsibilities regarding the identification of those eligible for the compensatory benefit housing benefit supplement.

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend has no specific legal powers or responsibilities in this area. However, a supplementary benefit claimant who fails, or ceases on income grounds to qualify for supplementary benefit, but otherwise meets the conditions of entitlement, is automatically sent a claim form for standard housing benefit. The form indicates the amount by which the claimant's income exceeds his assessed supplementary benefit requirements; this enables the local authority to calculate housing benefit supplement entitlement. The Department has also issued guidelines which enable local authorities to identify most claimants over pensionable age entitled to supplementary benefit or housing benefit supplement.

Residential Nursing Homes

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) who will have access to the list of those de-registered as proprietors of residential nursing homes;

(2) if he will include in the list of individuals who have been de-registered as proprietors of residential care homes an indication of those people who have worked in those homes;

(3) if he will include in a list of those persons who have been de-registered as proprietors of residential homes those people who as individuals have been deemed unfit to work in such homes;

(4) if information on people de-registered as proprietors of residential homes, those who worked in such homes and those deemed unfit to work in such homes will be collected centrally;

(5) if he will put a register of those de-registered as proprietors of residential care homes, those deemed unfit to work in residential care homes and those who have worked in de-registered residential care homes on computer and make immediate access to the information available to local authorities;

(6) how frequently he intends that a list of those individuals who have been de-registered as proprietors of residential care homes will be updated;

(7) what information he will include in the list of individuals who have been de-registered as proporietors of residential care homes;

(8) if he will publish details of his plans to establish a list of individuals who have been de-registered as proprietors of residential care homes.

Mr. John Patten: Information about the national list of cancelled homes registrations and its operation was set out for local authorities in the guidance notes forwarded with local authority circular LAC(84)15 and for district health authorities in health circular HC(84)21; copies of both of which are in the Library. The list will be issued quarterly from next April to registration authorities. It will be prepared by a computer and the Department would be prepared to consider a proposal from any authority that wished to arrange access to the computer. Apart from information held under the children's consultancy service, it is not proposed to collect centrally information about the staff of homes in relation to which a registration has been cancelled.

Board and Lodging Payment

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will increase the meals allowance element in the board and lodging payment in line with the recent increase in the supplementary benefit meals allowance.

Mr. Newton: Boarders who claim supplementary benefit are eligible for an amount to enable them to meet the cost of their board, and to meals allowances for any meals that are not provided, subject to a locally determined limit which is intended to reflect a reasonable charge for full board and lodging in the area concerned.

If a charge for full board is increased to reflect an increase in the cost of meals, the supplementary benefit payable can also be increased provided that the total charge remains within the local limit. Similarly, when the meals allowances are uprated on 26 November, claimants with part board will receive this increase provided that the total of their charge and the meals allowances remains within the local limit.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what were the average numbers of weekly payments for board and lodgings in Scotland since 1980 for tiers i, ii and iii;

(2) what were the average numbers of weekly payments for board and lodgings in Scotland for each individual tier for November to March 1980 to 1984 and April to September 1984.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have the available data as soon as possible.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many supplementary benefit appeals have been heard in Scotland on the subject of furniture grants since 1980; and what was the outcome in each case.

Mr. Newton: The information available is as follows:

*Appeals relating to claims for single payments for household expenses

Year	Number of appeals heard	Number of successful appeals
1980†	2,966	941
1981	1,485	408
1982	1,152	253
1983	1,726	428

* The description "household expenses" includes items such as carpets, curtains and crockery.

† Statistics for 1980 relate only to the total number of appeals about exceptional needs payments (now known as single payments.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will update to the latest date for which figures are available his answer on 30 June 1983, Official Report, column 141, information on the total number of single payments made; and if he will produce a table showing a breakdown of these figures by items covered and by type of claimant.

Mr. Newton: The information given by my hon. Friend, the Member for Brent, North (Dr. Boyson) in his reply to the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) on 30 June 1983 at column 141-42 was obtained from the "Annual Statistical Enquiries" for 1981 and 1982. Comparable figures from the 1983 enquiry are not yet available. However, the final figures for 1982, including a breakdown of payments made by items covered and by type of claimant, are given in tables 19.2 and 19.3 of the "Annual Statistical Enquiry 1982", a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many single payments were made for clothes in the latest year for which figures are now available; and what was the average payment.

Mr. Newton: According to the "Annual Statistical Enquiry" conducted in December 1982, about 75,000 single payments of supplementary benefit were made for clothing and footwear in 1982 — the latest year for which figures are available. The average payment was about £39. Because the figures relate to single payments made during the 12 months preceding the date of the enquiry to people still in receipt of supplementary benefit at the time if the enquiry, they are an under estimate of the total number of single payments made during the year.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the annual savings in public spending in (a) benefit year 1983-84 and (b) benefit year 1984-85 if all claimants of supplementary benefit were on the short-term rate.

Mr. Newton: The estimates requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Sickle Cell Anaemia

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to introduce screening for sickle cell anaemia as a matter of routine post natal testing.

Mr. John Patten: We fully accept the need for screening facilities but the local organisation of a screening programme must be a matter for individual health authorities.

Social Security Reviews

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will make a statement of the next stages of the work of the social security review teams following the public hearings;

(2) if he will publish a list of the Government Departments which have given evidence or made representations to the social security reviews, either to individual review teams or to the reviews generally;

(3) if he will list the Departments represented on the social security review teams;

(4) how many meetings, in addition to the formal hearings, have been held by each of the social security review teams;

(5) if he will list the names and numbers of advisers from outside Government, and civil servants from outside the Department of Health and Social Security, who are engaged in work for the social security reviews.

Mr. Fowler: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Doctors (Prescriptions)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the numbers of items prescribed by doctors which are not dispensed over the last recently-available period.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will conduct a survey into the reasons why items prescribed by doctors are not dispensed by chemists.

Mr. John Patten: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the proportion of items prescribed by doctors which cost less than £1.80.

Mr. John Patten: The precise information requested is not available. However, in England in 1983, the latest year for which information is available, 40·9 per cent. of prescriptions written by general practitioners and dispensed by chemists and appliance contractors had a net ingredient cost of less than £1.50. A further 9·1 per cent. had a net ingredient cost between £1.50 and £1.99.

Supplementary Pensions

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioners would cease to be entitled to supplementary pensions if (a) additional requirements for heating and (b) other additional requirements were abolished.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

"Social Security Statistics"

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will update table 34.45 of the "Social Security Statistics" to the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will update for 1983, or the latest date for which figures are now available, table 34/97 of the "Social Security Statistics".

Mr. Newton: The information requested is as follows:

Year	All Payments		Pensioners		Payments to Unemployed		Others
	Thousands	Average Amount £	Thousands	Average Amount £	Thousands	Average Amount £	Thousands	Average Amount £
1983	*1,890	75·64	188	62·33	976	76·00	728	78·59

*Rounded to nearest 10,000.

This information was obtained from the 100 per cent. count management statistics.

Child Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what would be the annual savings in child benefit if the full rate were restricted to families whose joint income is less than £120 a week and if a taper of (a) 10 per cent., (b) 20 per cent., (c) 30 per cent., and (d) 50 per cent., were introduced above that figure; and if he will publish a table showing how many families would lose (i) £1 or less, (ii) £1-£2, (iii) £2-£3 and (iv) £3 or more weekly;

(2) what would be the annual savings in child benefit if the full rate were restricted to families whose joint income is less than £180 a week and if a taper of (a) 10 per cent., (b) 20 per cent., (c) 30 per cent., and (d) 50 per cent., were introduced above that figure; and if he will publish a table showing how many families would lose (i) £1 or less, (ii) £1-£2, (iii) £2-£3 and (iv) £3 or more weekly

Mr. Newton: This information is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Residence Test

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to amend the residence test for pensioners over the age of 80 years.

Mr. Newton: An amendment to the Social Security (Widow's Benefit and Retirement Pensions) Regulations was laid before the House on 5 November. The amending regulations provide that with effect from 26 November 1984 periods of residence in Great Britain after age 80 may be taken into account for satisfaction of the 10 years residence test for non-contributory retirement pension. The amending regulations also provide that a person who failed to satisfy the former residence condition may have his entitlement reconsidered under the new condition from 26 November. Arrangements will be made as soon as possible to identify those existing pensioners who may qualify under the new arrangements and local social security offices will be pleased to deal with individual inquiries from potential beneficiaries.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Children (Custody Jurisdiction)

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice or assistance his Department provides to parents whose children have been taken from their custody to locations beyond the jurisdiction of United Kingdom courts.

Mr. Renton: Parents are advised that in the absence of any amicable settlement their only recourse is to take legal advice in the country where the children have been taken. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has instructed its consular posts to give whatever useful help they can to parents who face problems of this kind. This may include providing lists of local lawyers, trying to obtain welfare reports, assisting in connection with access to the children, drawing the attention of the authorities to any British court orders affecting the children, approaching the local authorities to help in tracing abducted minors and doing what they properly can to bring about a speedy conclusion of any legal proceedings dealing with a child's custody.

BBC External Services

Mr. Merlyn Rees asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he proposes to take to report to Parliament on the proceedings and conclusions of the committee of inquiry into aspects of the external services of the BBC.

Mr. Renton: The report of the team appointed to review the BBC external services was submitted simultaneously to my right hon. and learned Friend and to the chairman of the BBC's board of governors, at whose invitation the review was made, on 9 November. They are considering action on it.

Turkey

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has made any representations to the Turkish Government concerning their incursions into Iraqi territories.

Mr. Renton: We understand that the Turkish operations were conducted in hot pursuit of armed groups which had been responsible for the recent deaths of at least 18 members of the Turkish armed forces. As the Turks have acted with the prior agreement and approval of the Iraqi Government, we do not think there are any grounds on which we can intervene in what is essentially an agreed policy of two sovereign states.

North Korea

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why the United Kingdom does not recognise North Korea as a state.

Mr. Luce: There are exceptional circumstances in Korea, arising in part from the involvement of the United Nations in the Korean question, which leads this Government, along with all previous Governments, to the view that recognition of North Korea as a state would not be appropriate.

EEC (Budget Discipline)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the latest European Economic Community text based on the principles of budget discipline agreed by the European Council.

Mr. Rifkind: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury on 15 November at column 350, to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples). A copy of the text of the Council's common position on budgetary discipline has now been placed in the Library of the House.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 67

SESSION 1984-85

6th November—16th November 1984

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There will, however, be headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one will find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speakers ruling and statement'.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading 'Speaker'.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of the volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
